Autumn

Autumn.

George Manly was still deep in thought, and with the end of his rule, (for he was a carpenter,) he had been making a calculation, drawing the figures in the little puddles of gin upon the counter. He looked up, and saw Mrs. Crowder herself, as gay as her daughters, with a cap and coloured ribands flying off her head, and a pair of gold ear-rings, almost touching her plump shoulders. "A pint of ale, ma'am, is what I'm waiting for to-night," (no more spirits, he thought within himself, will I touch;) and then, as he put down the money for the ale, he looked her calmly in the face and said, "There are the fools' pence, and the last fools' pence intend to pay down for many a long day."

George Manly hastened home. His wife and his two little girls were sitting at work. They were thin and pale, really for want of food. The room is small, that its warmth must have been the apartment, and "This is indeed to-night," said Susan, as she stood before the other of the little arm-chair, and lying "Well, children, little fingers stop a moment about your father's arms." "O yes, we have
