The Muskoka Case. behalf of the admission of Mr. Cockburn was, it will be seen from the report specially telegraphed to The Tribune, an able and severely logical effort, and we are not at all surprised that Sir John Macdonald declined to ask his party to refuse to allow the precedent of 1862 to be followed. Mr. Blake made it appear own swearing.

During the forenoon a meeting of the sition, and henceforth the many-sided opposition will be led to defeat or victory, by his younger and more popular, as well as his more talented rival, Edward Blake.

About 3 o'clock the House of Commons met, seats on both sides being pretty well filled. There is an immediate silence, as Sir John A. Macdon and rises to address the new House. In rather a low voice, but slowly, distinctly, and with well-the chosen words, he nominates. Hon. Mr. Cockburn as "Mr. Speaker"—his argument being that the duties of the office had been impartially and efficiently performed by that gentleman; and that it would be well to follow out the English plan of re-electing their Speaker, when a good one had once been chosen.

Hon. Mr. Langevin duplicates Sir John's motion in French. "Shall the motion pass?" asks the clerk, who sits as Speaker pro tem. The proceedings have not all come to light; but it is known that the utmost harmony did not prevail. The more impulsive wanted to rush on certain defeat, by contesting the Speakership, and up near the hour of House meeting it was generally understood that Monsteur Dorion had been relected as the Opposition candidate for the Speaker's chair.

It was also rumored that the Quebec members and Mr. Blake's Ontario admirers desired a change of leaders. Accordingly Mr. Mackenzie, after five long years of ceaseless effort, during which he has utterly exhausted all the known methods—earthly, heavenly, and diabolical—of upsetting a government, resigned his position, and henceforth the many-sided opposition will be led to defeator victory, by his younger and more popular, as well as his more talented it val.
