possibility, as they foolishly think in Montreal, as a successor to Meighen. He would "listen to experts". The "experts" would be centred in St. James St. Montreal. Currie seems to be flirting with the idea. The result is that he has pronounced one man in three of Canada's overseas army "No good." Doubtless many of those "No-goods" are sleeping under little white crosses in France and Flanders. It could hardly be otherwise. They have done their part to lift Currie out of his little office in Vancouver (or Victoria) and into his big office in Montreal. They will be unable to resent his words. But the unidentified no-goods who are yet with us have reason to resent and will resent. Figures of soldiers sent overseas provided elsewhere.
