"Mrs. Henry Wood has certain qualities which should have made her one of our best novel-writers; popular is another word. No one lays out the plan of a story better than she does, and even Mr. Wilkie Collins himself, to whom ingenuity is the Alpha and Omega of his craft, is not greater than she is in the cleverness with which she devises her puzzles and fits the parts together. But Mrs. Wood loses herself in certain besetting sins, which are apparently beyond her power to overcome. She is petty, commonplace, and incredibly vulgar. . . . We do not find in her books a trace of that professional pride and thoroughness which desires to make a thing good all through without reference to publishers or profit."—Sat. Rev., xxxii. 602.
