by X. Come hither-come hither And I will explain

The Riddle of X, And make it quite plain .-He speaks through a bone Of no little size. That once had a place Near an animal's eves

Found by a Prophet Who fought with his foes, Who with it those heathen Struck wonderful blows

Good corn it once ground, For its master of old. But now it had found

A labour more bold In heaps upon heaps The bodies were laid A hill large and gory, The prophet soon made!

But we will follow Of X the good fashion, And let the bone speak. In strains, good and dashing "When my Master was living Much water ran by

Just where I lay chewing,-Not far from his eve :-But none could I spare To relieve a faint soul. Until away from my Lord. And free from control: Then God gave me honor, And made me a brook,

That Samson, just dving To save his life took .-When he had done slaving He threw me away. But God gave me honor

That notable day: When Samson was weary And nigh unto death, To me it was given To revive his spent breath To save his own life

He had me to find, And felt for his friend A little more kind :-When he put to his lips

The water I gave, And knew that his Maker Through a jaw bone could save, -He should have placed me, For the service I bore Along with his treusure,

Though stained all with gore And when he surveyed The blood, and the hollow," Be never betrayed Any evil to follow :

But think of the good That God through me brought To keep alive faith, And nourish pure thought."

Thus the riddle of X I pla nir expound. But in its new aspect. A strange one have found: I learn from the motto

Placed over the piece, That in our own days Strange wonders don't cease The bone that is made To tell its own tale In Lutin quotations,

Appears to regale ! Is the moito by X Or by the bone made ?-Or afe they united, In the wood riddle trade ?-

If so-I desire These bones not to creak When they grind out in speech Their Latin and Greek!
