The Foster Brother:

The Orphan of the Wreck. CHAPTER XXI.

RE ECLIPSE FOLLOWED BY A WONDER-FUL BREAKING OF THE LIGHT.

What a frightful horror of soul had come upon George Eglantine. To see Lilias Gibson in the company of another lover was to feel as if the stability of the universe had given away, as if the basis of human faith was a delusion, as if existence itself had no standing ground, as if an abyss of dark nothingness was swallowing up all that he had deemed permanent and eternal. For up to that moment he would have lost faith in the existence of virtue itself ere the faintest thought could have entered his soul that Lilias could prove false and deceitful. If she was what his own eyesight had declared, then human love and heaven's goodness, which in her person he had reverenced and worshipped, were a dream, and the bright visions of its beauty but a mocking phantom.

A thousand times rather would he have lost faith in the trustworthiness of his own senses, and rejoiced with a joy unspeakable had it been possible to believe that his eye sight had deceived him—that what he saw was but the conjurings of his brain, suddenly seized by an inexplicable malady. But, alas! he could not find relief in a refuge even so desperate, for as he lay heavy and rigid against the wire-fence which encircled the trees, he could see between the trunks the open space of the park and the two figures drawing every moment nearer. He had ample opportunity to watch and observe them, and as the distance lessened, any ground of hope which he sought to cling to vanished away. Most surely was it Lilias, and as surely was she clinging to her companion's arm with every demonstration of the prondest affection. And with their faces turned to each other, whispered words were passing between them, which, though he could not hear, could only too well interpæt.

Her companion's face George could not discern, for his broad brimmed hat was pulled far over his brow, but he could see that he was about his own age, and he had a handsome manly figure, and that he supported Lillias phy his encircling arm, with a pride and tendern ess which showed how dear she was to h

earer and nearer they came, and in coment or two more they would be to where he stood. What would pen then? Would she consummate eruel treachery by a burst of mocking ther and disdain? Would she prome him to her companion as the poor r who, in the madness of presumpts folly, had dared to proffer her his, and would they both gaze with pittriumph on the writhings of his his mind, when they turned the er of the clump of trees, and were in a few feet of him, yet they passed and never saw him. Standing there ionless, and in the deep shadow of trees, he escaped their notice, and all more easily that they were absorbed ash other, and in the conversation which they were engaged. But they sed so close that the flowing dress of as almost touched George's arm, and as were the tones in which they ke, he distinctly heard the words che were being uttered. Fear not, dear Lillias," said her comion, in a rich deep voice. "Should some hither, I will protect you from anger."

"Possibly, but I am ready to brave it quite ready, let us meet when we may." These were the words which reached George's ear, and their first effect was to strike a still colder chill into his heart. Then as the speakers went on and entered the arbor the spell which had rendered him motionless relaxed, and with a great leap he passed round the corner of the clump, where they could have no chance of seeing him.

Here he gave way to the terrible emotions which could no longer be restrained. He tagged fercely at his heaving, surg-
