It teaches that asthma is not an organic disease of the lungs (therein radic-ally differing from consumption), but an af-fection of the nerves which control the action of the lungs. Its actual cause has nothing whatever to do with the function of breath-blood arising from fermented food in the stomach and bowels. These peisons, acting in concert with the bile acids, which should be (but are not) abstracted from the blood by the sluggish liver, weaken and demoral-ize the nerves, and bring on the attacks of
