that his generous ofter was gratefully accepted, and a few days before his death the University of Western Ontario was enriched by the gift of its kindly benefactor.

His library was very extensive, covering a period of many years and embracing every phase and aspect of medical science. The number of books dealing with medical legislation slowed the bent of the Doctor's interest. A few of the books were very old and exceedingly valuable from an historical point of view, and were an indication that the subject of this sketch was interested not alone in modern science but also to a marked degree in its early growth and development.
