

able to see properly organized research schools in the universities where by the help of the Research Council men can be so trained that it will be unnecessary for them to leave Canada to complete their work. My judgment is that the weakest part of our whole university system in Canada today is in our graduate work. We train a great body of men in undergraduate courses of an excellent quality, and because we have no graduate schools worthy of the name, we allow other countries to take away our choicest men and train them for their own services. I would hope that in the effort to straighten this out, McGill, instead of being fearful of the National Research Council's work, would join with us in helping to remove what I regard as a stigma upon our universities.

With kind regards,

Sincerely yours,

A handwritten signature in dark ink, appearing to read 'A. M. G. G. G.', written in a cursive style.

Enc.

President.