people of Barrie, Ontario, appear to be exercised over a runaway which took place hence on the Friday before New Year's, involving an amount of cleverly contracted liabilities apparently equal to the full extent of the man's credit. The absconder is John Livingston, proprietor of the Victoria Hotel in that town, a man supposed to be doing a good business, and who certainly enjoyed very fair or good credit. On the Tuesday before his flight he borrowed $840 from a prominent local broker, his standing being so good that there was no hesitation about honoring his own unendorsed note; $400 was procured from another party on similar security. His accounts with the butchers, bakers, produce dealers, etc., had been allowed to run on for some months; he owes for pork, etc., alone some $700, and it is supposed he victimized local merchants to the tune of $4,000 and upwards, besides various persons for money borrowed. Indeed he appears to have tested his borrowing powers generally and unsparingly. He had a valuable farm in Oro which he quietly mortgaged for $3,500 and as quietly sold to his brother. He was also known to have considerable money out at interest on mortgages, but he managed to sell them all without arousing any suspicion of his intentions. The total haul is estimated at from $10,000 to $12,000. He gave as an excuse for postponing payment of his local accounts that he had purchased land, etc., and his credit being so good, he was allowed plenty of time to make every preparation to skip out. It now transpires that his landlord has a chattel mortgage covering all that is left in the hotel, and that he is in Bank on Livingston's paper for some $1,500, so that the prospects for other creditors are anything but bright. He is said to owe for goods, etc., some $6,000 to $7,000. There is much feeling naturally evoked over such a heartless runaway; those whose losses are light and can afford to jest on the subject are enquiring for some Stanley to go and find this degenerated Livingston. He is supposed to be in the United States.
