This is an accurate description of the British constitution, and there is scarely another in the world that fully answers to it. The fathers of the American republic made for it a puper constitution that was deemed perfect, and bequeathed it to their successors as a secred legacy to be preserved intact. But crises came for which the constitution had not provided, and amendments have been made to meat them. After the lapse of another hundred years the constitution, by reason of amendments and recognized interpretations, will be much more of an "outgrowth of the national character" than any new-made document could possibly be. The limitations, possibilities, declarations and negations of a constitution must be such as only the experience of centuries has shown to the government, laws, institutions, feel- following address: New Goods by every Steamer to this and Halifax ports.
