appointment to the position of minister of mines, about to be created for that purpose. This promise was of material assistance to him in his election campaign in the Yukon, though after all he seems to have been elected by the ballots which were not deposited by electors. The question of the additional port-folio was brought up the other day in the house, and mention was made of the former liberal contention that there were already too many heads of departments. This position was once flercely affirmed by several who are now in the government, notably by Sir William Mulock and Sir Richard Cart-wright. Sir Richard Insisted that the department of Trade and Commerce was useless. Written to instruct and help the common people, the most popular of Dean Farrar's books advances no theories and does not profess to be a critical study. But these works, and much more those dealing with the history of the Chris-tion Church during the case were twelve departments, including that of Trade and Commerce. Under the minister of Trade and Commerce were the two controllers, whose salaries were $5,000 each, or $2,000 less than the minister received. Sir Wiltion Church during the early centuries, trid filled all the departments and indicate an immense amount of re-search. It was made clear that the intention was to abolish one department at least, so that there would be no more than thirteen ministers, instead of twelve ministers and two controllers. During the short session of the sume the controllety busines in the first the position of Minister of Trade be-came an absolute sineoure. The effect of the change is that the number of ministers has been increased by two, and the amount paid in salaries to heads of departments is larger than ever it was under conservative govern-ments. Yet it seems to be proposed to add other departments, without abol-ishing any of the three which are prac-tically without duties.
