LIHET.

Twelve months later the snow again lay deep upon the Ellion Hills, and muffled in strange silence the busy town of Galashiels. Again were knots of men and women gathered in the streets, chatting cagerly in the dinner hour. But their faces were a bright expression of pleasant anticipation, and instead of muttering of nurder they babbled lithely of marriage, to the sound of clanging bells of welcome. Many things had happened since the momorable day upon which a sudden stream of mystery and horror had flooded the town, and the Mackworth indicants had become the sensation of the hour. Men and women had come and gone, fears had been dispeited, bright day dreams realised, and clouds, which at one time threatened to break in a storm which should wreck lives and break hearts, had given place to sunshine.

Amongst the crowd, moving slowly hither and thither, exchanging greetings with triends with many a pleasant smile and word, were Andrew M'Gloskie and his wife-for Mrs. Donald had some time since proved old Mrs. Macintyre to be something of a prophetes: by marrying the detective; and a happy couple they were, as their beaming faces showed. "Eh, but Andy, this is a bonnie change frace a twelve month syne," said his guid wife as they stood aside a moment while a carriage passed, in which were seated Jasper Mackworth and a grave, silver haired woman with a sad but gentie face. "Ay, is it," responded the detective, "Wha wad hae thooth then that we wad hae lived to see what we hae seen? Wha wad hae thooth for instance, that Mrs. Donald—"

"Eh, there—just cease your haivers—"

"An' thank heaven fora guid wife, I suppose ve'd say, Kate M'Closkie," restorted

"An' thank heaven fora guid wife, I suppose ye'd say, Kate M'Oloskie," retorted her burly husband, laughing.
"It will be time to be shankfu' later on, Ye dinna ken what sort o'a bargain ye're saddled wi' yet, Andrew."
"Weel, I'll just has to tak' my chance. But I'm not afraid, Kate," he added quickly and tenderly, for not even in jest would he let it appear that there was any flaw in his strong, manly love for this worthy woman he had grown to love and honor from his very soul for her kind and honest nature.

"A faut's but a faut, and it a' happened sae mony years ago that the hand o' Time has blotted oot a." that the hand o' Time has blotted oot a' the ugly lines i' the story, an' now,—weel, now it may be that both Jasper Macke worth and the woman he wronged i' the auld days may find peace an' something better that peace at the end."

"I was tauld that she wadna hear o' it at first," remarked Mrs. M'Oloskie.

"Never mind that, Kate. It was better surely for Jasper Mackworth's ain flesh and bluid to gae free and have anither chance—and I'm richt glad it was offered to him and he took it."
"Eh, and dinna think that I wad say a word against it. I was glad when I heard that those he had wranged were noble enough to tell him to go and sin nae mair? I ca' that practical Ohristianity, an' it's a thousand pities that there' not a little mair o' it in the warld."
"That's true enough, dame," said the detrolive, with a glance of honest affection at his wife. "But what wad ye has said if a like favor had been granted to Reub More?"

"Puir lassie! I see her grave is always green an' wi' flowers on it the seasons round."

"Ay, Jeanie tak's care o' that—God bless her kind heart, an' mak her as happy as a summer day is long?"

"Eh, she'll be happy enough, and deserves to be, for she proved hersel' leal, and brave, and tender, an' what woman could do mair? An' now she's marrit an' a'."

"She's a three month's auld bride the noo. Three months is it sync they were made man an' wife i' the auld Kirk, an' I dootna that after their travels abroad they will be richt glad to get back to bonnie Scotland!"

they will be richt glad to get back to bonnie Scotland."

Just then the carriage swept by again amidst the respectful salutations of the people, for Jesper Mackworth was an altered man, and there was no better master, and none better beloved now than the owner of Mackworth's Mill.

And the whole town knew the story of the old man and his gentle, silver haired wife—knew it, and agreed to forget the past for the sake of the present. The woman's mother had died a few months before, so that there was no longer any fear of any disordant note marring the peace which had at list, so late but not too late, fallen upon those two lives, and they were happy. A sit among the crowd, a murmur, the sound of wheels coming nearer and nearer, then a carriage in sight, in which sat Herbert Mackworth, with the hue of health upon his cheek and the light of true love dancing in his eyes; Jeanie—sweet, flower like Jeanie, gentle and beautiful as ever, blushing pretitily and with happy tears o'er brimming her blue eyes. And, opposite to them, old Jasper, grave and dignified and kindly, with an expression upon his worn face such as in all the past years none had ever seen upon it, and, by his side, a gentle, sad faced woman, with tender eyes and silver hair, who held his hand.

to these two souls were known depths of emotion, reasons hidden from the world, which made one ready to forgive the past, the other eager to redeem is in the eyes of man and God.

And so it came about that upon a bright, keen, wintry day, Herbert Mackworth and Jeanie his bride came back to the town of their birth rich in mutual love, rich in the knowledge that lives not their own, but only near and dear to them, would share in the sunlit happiness which they felt was in store for them now that the old dark days of dauger and distress had passed away.

In the old home the grey haired couple would find passe, and in their own cosy nest, built by the side of the lovely road to Melrose, within hearing of the lovely Tweed, Herbeat and Jeanie looked forward to years of happiness such as leyal lovers alone can know. Years, too, of usefulness and helpful sympathy with one and all about them, for both of them knew enough of life and had seen enough of sorrow to feel the value of a gentle word, a kindly deed.

And in this house was a special room for Stephen Doone, where the latter years of his honourable life should be spent in
