THE USURPER

"It was best," he said. "I did it for the best. When those soundrels seized her and left me for dead, they robbed me of every penny I possessed. Luck was dead against me. I heard she had fallen into the hands of a kind-hearted lady and a nobleman who would take care of her, and I—I'm a proud man, Lord Lorrimore, and I could not be a burden to her," and he hung his head.

"Yes," said Lorrimore, "You are proud, I see. But did it never occur to you that the young lady might suffer somewhat at the less of her brother, as we thought you."

Neville started.
"No," he said, "Poor Sylvia, did she—did she grieve much?"

Lorrimore laughed grimly.
"Great heaven, he asks me that?" he remarked, ironically. "Did she griev?" Why, my good friend, she nearly died; we had to light death inch by inch, hour by hour, for days; and as to grieving, why—but I think I'd better stop. A proud man's bad enough, but a conceited."

Neville held his face in his hands.

Neville held his face in his hands.
"My dear, dear darling! he murmured. "And she's in there!" he exclaimed, dropping his hand to Lorrimore's arm.
"In there! Think of it, my lord! And I shall see her directly."
Lorrimore sighed.

Lorrimore sighed. "Yes," he said, hanging his head. "You are a happy man! So is the woman love in there, and I shall probably sether directly; but it will be for the last time—the last time!" and with a sigh he time—the last time!" and with a sign ae rose.

Neville, biting his lips, looked at him.
"I—I wouldn't give up all hope, Lord Lorrimore," he said.

Lorimore, "he said.

Lorimore faced round and started, then shook his head.

"There can be no hope for me, Mr. Lynne," he said. "Miss Audrey is engaged to your brother."

Neville groaned.
"Look here!" he said, in his abrupt, backwoods fashion. "Don't you go off to Africa yet. You can't tell what may turn up. Look at my case! Here am I sneaking in this garden to get a glimpse of an old friend, Ardirey, and I hear the voice"—his own broke—"of the girl I No., the girl I've been parted from forever, as I thought. Take courage by my luck."

"Yest! But your girl is not engaged to ever, as I thought. Take courage by my luck."

"Yes! But your girl is not engaged to another man—at least, I don't think so; I don't know!" 'What!" gasped Neville, at the mer ea of a doubt. "Sylvia engaged!"

"You see!" said Lorrimore, with a sad nile. "You can imagine how I feel!

"No, I can't!" said Neville, his hands clinched at his side, his broad chest heaving. "If I found Sylvia, my little Sylvia, engaged, l'd—"

ing. "If I found Sylvia, my little Sylvia, engaged, I'd—"
"Fling the other man out of the window," said Lorrimore, with a laugh and a sigh. "Yes, that's all very well for the backwoods of Australia, but—" he shrugged his shoulders, "well, Mr. Lynne, though nothing would give me greater delight than to fling Sir Jordan out of the window—I beg your pardon! I forgot that he is your brother!" he broke off, apologetically.

Neville shook his head and groaned:

he said.

Before Lorrimore could ask for an explanation of this singularly unfraternal sentiment Trale came up.

"There's Miss Audrey come out on the terrace, Mr. Neville," he said. "Now—now, I was thinking if his iordship wouldn't mind going and breaking your being here to her, you might go and see her. But you won't say anything about—about—you know what?" he implored. Lorrimore assented at once.

"Wait here, Mr. Lynne, until I call," he said, and went toward the terrace. Sylvia had sung twice, and had then run up to see Mercy.

"I'll smoke my cigar on the terrace," said the viscount, "if you'll come, Audrey. The signorina will join us when she comes down, I hope—that is, if she is not afraid of the night air."

"I'm afraid of nothing!" responded Sylvia, with a laugh, as she left the room.

"Lovely night, isn't it?" said the vis.

"Lovely night, isn't it?" said the vis-

rather tamely. "The fact is, I'm off to Africa."

"To where?" exclaimed the viscount.

"Africa. And I thought I should bke to say good-bye to Miss Hope before I went, as I shall be away some time."

Poor Audrey's heart beat heavily, and her bosom heaved.

"Good heavens! what a man you are for rushing about!" said the viscount, reproachfully. "You don't seem as if you could stop more than five minutes in one place. Airica, too! What's the use of spending your time among savages? Besides, if you're so fond of 'em. you might as well stay at home; we've got plenty of 'em here. Have a cigar." Have some wine—I hope you've dined!"

Lorrimore said falsely that yes, he adined, and accepted the cigar.

"We've got your friend, the famous Signorina Stella, in the house," said the viscount. "She'll be delighted to see you, I dare say, and I'll set her on to dissuading you from this absurd African idea; eh, Audrey?"

"Sylvia will be very sorry," she said, almost inaudibly.

"Stylvia will be very sorry," she said, almost inaudibly.

"I'll go and see about some wine," said Lord Mariow.

The two left alone were silent for a moment or two, Audrey's heart beating too fast to allow of her speaking at first, and Lorrimore wondering how on earth he should break the news of Neville's proximity. At last he said:

"I'm afraid I have made my visit at an unconventionally late hour. Miss Hope, but I meant starting to-morrow."

"You meant," she said, keeping her voice steady by an effort.

"Yes, I may be a day or two later now. The fact is—" Then, like most men engaged in "breaking" the news, he blurted it out, "Audrey, I have heard of Neville Lynne."

She started, but did not look overcome

She started, but did not look overcome She started, but did not look overcome with joy. She was too much engaged thinking of another man—the Earl of Lorrimore, to wit—to be very much moved, even by the return of her old friend.

"Yes! He—well, the fact is, that he is "Well," replied Lorrimore. "I should if Sylvia had not been here."

"Here! Where! Oh!" and she looked "Yes," said Lorrimore. "I met him tonight, by the most singular chance, and I have only just left him."

"Left him? Where? Oh, why did you "Left him? Where? Oh, why did you not bring him with you?" said Audrey.

"Sylvia! What has Sylvia to do with him or he with her?" demanded Audrey.
Lorrimore was a bad hand at telling a story, and he looked round helplessly.
"The long and short of it is," he said, "that they know each other—that they are both friends."
"Sylvia and Neville Lynne!"
"Yes."
And in as few words as possible he

And in as few words as possible he told her the story, or as much as he knew of it, Audrey's eyes growing larg-er and larger as she listened and gazed at him.

"All the while the poor girl was lying at Wildfall, as near death as she could be, and thinking him dead, he was at Lorn Hope Camp, within a few miles of her. It's the most exasperating, aggravating business aht the mind of man can conceive," he said, grimly.

"Actually within a few miles of him and not to know of it."

at all," he said, simply, "but of poor Sylvia. And now the question is, how am I going to bring him to her without scar-

I going to oring mm to ner without scaring her out of her senses? She thinks him dead—dead, don't you see?"
"I see," said Audrey, slowly and thoughtfully. "Yes, I see!" And she indeed saw more than Lorrimore had put to her. She understood, now, why Sylvia was not married, why she received via was not married, why she received men's homage and admiration with such coldness, and reserve. "Oh; the poor gir!!" she muttered, "and to think it is Neville Lynne. Oh. "I am so glad! So, glad!" and in her joy at her prospects of her friend's happiness, she turned to him with tears glistening in her eyes, and looking so lovely that poor Lorrimore's head swam.

"Yes, I'm glad he's turned up, and—and I wish I'd found him," and he turned his head away.

and I wish I'd found him," and he turned his head away.
Audrey's eyes fell.
"But now we've got to break the news to her," he said. "You see what a splendid hand I am at that kind of thing, and I'm afraid you will have to do it."
"Yes," said Audrey, softly. "I will do it. Where is he?"
"Out there in the shrubbery," he said.
"Waiting for me to call him. Shall I do so?".

"Waiting for me to call him. Shall I do so?".

"No, no; not yet. He must not come yet, in case she should come out suddenly and see him, without being prepared—ah, here she is!" she broke off, as Sylvia's voice was heard singing as she came. "Here's Lord Lorrimore, Sylvia," said-Audrey, trembling a little.

Sylvia utered an exclamation of pleasure.

Middletown, Oct. 14 .- One man was killed, five others will probably die, and five or eight were badly injured to-day when seventeen cars of a work broke and the rest of the train went into the ravine.

A hundred laborers were rushed to the spot and began digging the injured out of the wreckage. The seriously injured were rushed to hospitals here in ambulances which were sent to the

Buffalo, Oct. 15 .- Mrs. H. O. Alexander, residing in the Wayne apartment

Buffalo, Oct. 15.—Mrs. H. O. Alexander, residing in the Wayne apartment house, 1,104 Main street, was frightfully burned late yesterday afternoon; a dozen women in the block were thrown int management. The woman was cleaning clothing with gasoline in her apartments on the third floor, when the fituid exploded. She was immediately enveloped in flame. The woman screamed for help and ran for the rear stairs after throwing some clothing about her. Women in the flat heard her screams and saw her running down the stairs, flames leaping from every part of her clothing.

She fell at the bottom of the stairs and it was there that the heroic rescue work began.

Mrs. T. Keifer, wife of the custodian of the flat, heard the woman drop to the floor. She looked out of her door and saw Mrs. Alexander writhing in her blazing garments. She grasped a table-cloth and three the stairs about the sufferer,
