THE WRONG MAN.

BY THE HON. MRS. A. MONTGOMERY. Author of 'Miss Oen Frazier's Friend.'

Never before had she felt so much as if in some way Frederick belonged to her—that she was allied to all that concerned him; and that it was painful, revolting, irksome. Was he not a great criminal?—one whose very parents blushed to name; one banished forever from the sacred precincts of home, and the society of the innocent? And now she was asked if she knew about him? The blood rushed to her cheeks as she made an effort to answer.

figure and very white feminine hands. Altogether, he was what might be called very good-looking, although his features, taken separately, were not fine, and it was more a question of good coloring, and a certain sprightliness of expression, than real beauty. It would not bear the wear of time, or the touch of sorrow or disease. It was the good looks which belong chiefly to youth, good health and enjoyment. He was a great talker. He was talking volubly to Louise, and making her laugh merrily—never a very difficult thing to do.

way in which the same opinion was viewed by the two girls. To Louise, the mystery, the slight flavor of an unknown inquiry, was full of tantalizing interest. When Madeline was at length brought to acknowledge that he was, or had been (for poor Frederick Herbert was never more from her), she was sure he would tell her; and then she would impart the knowledge to Madeline.
