Britain in Persia.

The agreement recently made between the British and Persian Governments is one which has given rise to many international heartburnings and jealousies, the press of other countries declaring that the Imperial au- ment House this morning, at 11 thorities have gone in for more aggrandizement at the expense of the Shah and his kingdom, and with an ultimate possibility of making Persia into another British protectorate. "Land grabber" is a charge hurled at Great Britain by hostile observers of her pact with the Persian administration, and harsh criticism of the agreement have been indulged in by the majority of French journalists.

Apart from the minor details of the new Anglo-Persian treaty, the main points are but two: Britain lends Persia British army officers to reorganize her forces and establish order, and conjointly with the Indian Government, advances to Persia the sum of two million pounds, which loan is secured on the Persian customs. In addition Britain promises to support certain of Persia's claims for reparation by Turkey and Germany against damages done by these countries Saturday last, was forced to return during the war, and also agrees to uphold the rectification of the Persian frontier. There is nothing to foreshadow British ashore at North Sydney. aggrandizement and control in Persia, because of the text of this treaty.

The soil is very fertile producing an immense variety of crops, the chief cultivated products being wheat, sugar and rice, and in many sections tobacco. The Caspian especially the sturgeon, great cured and exported to Russia. Minerals exist plentifully, chiefly iron, copper, lead, antimony, coal, sulphur and naphtha.

All these Persian products are vitally necessary to Britain, if she is to take her former place among the great manufacturing nations of the world, and consequently the new treaty gives the Empire a priority over all other countries in developing and increasing the output of Persia's raw material, and it is this decided advantage which has been secured by agreement that arouses the jealousy of the other nations, which have been diplomatically prevented from at La Scie, was lost there during the having an equal share in the recent storm.
