

average novel of the day. I don't agree with this gentleman, but he is at least more thorough-going than your correspondent.

Works of science and philosophy by Darwin, Tyndall, Huxley, Lyell, Kant, Spinoza, John Stuart Mill, Carlyle, Mueller, Spencer, Renan, Buchner, and a host of other intellectual giants, who have been, and some of whom are now, leading exemplary, moral lives, though they may be classed as "imodels" in the narrow, bigoted sense of the word, should also consistently be avoided by this conscientious bookseller. Very many newspapers, and the Bible itself contain passages which are not all that can be desired, to say the least.

Religious books, belonging to any other sect or denomination than his own, should also be excluded from your correspondent's counter. It is quite evident that he would find his sales decreasing very much, were he to refuse to sell books and papers, asked for by the very many people who do not consider every book "pestiferous" that does not stand on the level of his morality and decency. There was a time when printing itself was considered by very religious people an art invented by the devil. These people were consistent enough never to learn to read or write. Had it depended upon them, we would to-day have no "Robert Elsmere," no newspapers, no scientific books, no booksellers.

Your correspondent need not be afraid. His selling, or refusing to sell, "Robert Elsmere" who, by the way, is supposed to have been copied from the Deist Rev. Chas. Vorse, of London, Eng. will not hurt his chances, nor those of its readers in this or a future life; nor will it prevent the expression of honest thought and of honest doubt. Young and old have a perfect right to read, to think, to doubt, to believe and to speak, and your conscientious correspondent should not try to deprive them of this right. Of the many great qualities attributed to the founder of Christianity, very few are being possessed by those ostensibly his followers, but that quality which is found the least is that of tolerance towards those who think or believe differently.

Trusting that I have not used too much space, and offering to give your readers the names of one hundred books written by well known and justly celebrated authors which, according to your correspondent's standard, should not be sold by him, I remain, yours respectfully
