

drag the carriages. They were struck with the grand scenery of the country.

Inpruck is finely situated on the Inn. They passed the river the succeeding morning, and toiled the whole day up steep hills, or cautiously descended down frozen roads. They travelled the last stage, to Reits, by the pale light of the moon, which magnified the appearance of the mountains and reflected its beams on dark forests of fir, rising in beautiful contrast above extended wastes of snow. At the edge of these forests their servant saw two prowling wolves, in spite of which, however, and in spite of many a fearful precipice, they arrived, about midnight, at a good inn at Reits.

At Reits they understood that the nearest road would lead them through Bavaria, but a passport could not be obtained without delay; they therefore continued their course over the plains of Suabia, diversified with fine plantations of fir and parkish flocks; and after a tedious lingering drive, arrived long after midnight, at Augsburg.

Augsburg has the spacious streets and bold character of a town that once flourished considerably. Its buildings are of a better character than those of contemporary cities; and the simple front of the town-house has been very much and very justly admired.

No remarkable town intervened so easily between Augsburg and Ulm, which are distant four posts and a half from each other. They continued their journey by Westerstetten, Geislingen, Gappingen, and Blockingen, five posts to Stuttgart, the capital of the duke of Württemberg's dominions, which are bounded by the Alps and the Black Forest, and contains about twenty thousand inhabitants.

They left the town next day and pursued their course over a trackless road, to Mannheim, which is but a few miles from Heidelberg. Having visited Bingen, they proceeded by Lauterhall to Simmer, where they slept.

Early the next morning they reached Treves, kept that day at Gravenmacker, and arrived the next day by dinner at Luxemburg: they then drove by Steinfort to Attori, where they slept.

The next day they were shaken over very bad roads by Malmifon to Flamfoel, and thence through treary and almost unpeopled wilds, on which, however, much cattle is bred, by Grinshein to Marche, where they slept, and the next day proceeded over level unintercepting plains to Namur.

They arrived at Brussels March 27, and thence proceeded with all speed to England.
