RECORDS OF WOMAN: WITH OTHER POEMS.

By FELICIA HEMANS, Edinburgh, 1828.

Mrs. Hemans, in her selection of her own poetry, which reflect honour on the species, as well as on the individual, has, of course, chosen examples calculated to throw a light upon the nature of the female heart, in situations in which its affections are passing through its most exalted state. There are altogether nineteen "Records;" and these are sufficiently varied, and for the most part sufficiently striking. The first is of the Lady Arabella Stuart, who spent the greater part of her life in captivity, because her father, from Mar-garet, eldest daughter of Henry VIII. desired to give her in marriage to the crown of England, which excited the jealousy of James I. She was secretly married to Lord William Seymour, but having been intercepted in an attempt she made to fly with him to the Continent, she was separated from him forever, and spent away in solitary imprisonment. The second is entitled "The Bride of the Greek Isle." A young maid of Sicily was carried off by pirates on the eve of her bridal day. At midnight, the pirate vessel, which is still in sight of the island, is seen to be in flames. The Greek girl stands upon the deck, watching in her hand the lighted torch with which she had kindled her own funeral pyre. The third is "The Swiss Wife," a simple but beautiful record of woman's patriotism. It is the wife of a Swiss soldier, who first received him with courage to leave his family and home, and became one of the three confederates of the field of Grutli. The fourth is the story of "Proserpine's Fall"—a record of woman's love. She was a female sculptor of Rome, and her husband a poet and musician, but she died of a broken heart, brought on by unrequited attachment. A painting is extant, which represents her showing her last work, "a bust in relief of Psyche, to a Roman Knight, the object of her affection, who regards it with indifference." The fifth is a record of "Fidelity to Death," in the instance of Gertrude, wife of the Baron von Der Wart, who attended and comforted her husband during the whole of his lingering sufferings on the wheel, on which he was unjustly sentenced to die. The sixth is another tale of hapless love, Imelda's brother slew with a poisoned sword the young knight who had possession of her heart. The Italian girl left the banquet and the dance in her father's hall, and having sucked the poison from the wound which he proved already fatal, laid herself down and died. The seventh is entitled "Edith, a Tale of the Woods." Edith had followed her husband, who was a soldier, to North America; he was killed in a skirmish with the natives, and she was carried into the woods, and demoralized in an Indian family. They treated her kindly with all hospitality, but she felt that the hand of death was on her. Before she left them for the land of spirits she wished to confer a boon upon the Indian family; her wishes were granted, by the achievement of their conversion to the true faith; they prayed together, and her soul passed away in the presence of its Creator. The eighth is "The Indian City"—a record of revenge, prompted by outraged maternal feelings. The son of a Mohican lady was slain for having ventured into the holy ground in the neighbourhood of a Bramin city. His mother shed few tears, but she journeyed from realm to realm, and through each her tale "rang like a trumpet's blast;" still she at length returned at the head of an army to the Bramin city, and laid it in the dust. Then, as Indians she yielded to her grief, and was buried beside her son. The ninth is "The Peasant Girl of the Rhone," a record of blighted and hopeless love. A funeral pomp passed by, and a young warrior was consigned to the dust. "The sculptor gave Trophees, ere long, to deck that lordly grave, And the pale image of a youth arrayed As warriors are for fight, but calmly laid In slumber on his shield. Then all was done, All still around the dead—His name was heard, Perchance, when wine-cups flowed and hearts were stirred.

By some old song or tale of battle won, Told round the hearth; but in his father's heart; Manhood's high passions woke again, and pressed On to their mark; and in his friend's clear eye There dwelt no shadow of a dream gone by; And with the breath of his fields, the feast Was gay as when the voice whose sounds had rend'ring mingled with theirs. 'Tis in that life's rushing tide Bears back affection from the grave's dark side; Alas! to think of this—the heart's void place Fill'd up so soon—so like a summer cloud, All that he lov'd is gone, and leave no trace!

He lay forgotten in his early shroud— Forgotten!—not of all!—the sunny smile Glancing in play o'er that proud lip, ere while, And the dark locks whose breezy waving threw A gladden round, when'er their shade withdrew; From the bright brow, and all the sweetest tinge: Within that eagle eye's jet radiance deep, And all the music with that young voice dying, Those joyous echoes made the quick heart leap As at a hunter's bugle, and the raven's cry Still in one breast, whose silent love survived The pangs of kindred sorrow."

For years the tomb was found decked every morning With fresh garlands, no matter whether the season was summer or winter; yet no one knew from whose hands those flowers came. At length

"O! the spring-morn rose, And fond within that tomb's proud shadow laid— Oh! not as midst the vineyards to repose From the fierce noon—a dark-haired peasant maid: Who could reveal her story?—That will far find one o'er been fair, for on the dark arch'd brow, And the curl'd lip their linings yet such grace A sculpture gives its dreams; and long and low The deep black lashes, o'er the half-shut eye For death was on his lids—fell mournfully— But the cold cheek was sunk, the raven hair Diamond, the slight form all waist'd, as by care.— Whence came that early blight? Her kindred's place Was not amidst the high Deo Conci race!

"Yet there her shrine had been! She grasped a wreath 'The tomb's last garland!—'This was love in death!"

The tenth is "The Indian Woman's Death Song." An Indian woman, driven to despair by her husband's desertion of her for another wife, entered a canoe with her children, and rowed it down the Mississippi towards a cataract. Her voice was heard from the shore, singing a mournful death song, until she was covered by the sound of the waters in which she perished. The eleventh is a record of "Joan of Arc." During the coronation of Charles VII. in Rheims, when Joan of Arc was in all her glory, her father and two brothers suddenly presented themselves before her, and spent an hour of puerile felicity amidst their tears and congratulations, than she had done amidst all the triumphs and splendour to which she had recently been accustomed.—The twelfth is another record of the strength of maternal affection, but more commonplace than the former. It is called "Pauline," and describes a mother rushing into the midst of a blazing palace, in the vain hope of saving her daughter from the flames, and consequently perishing with her.—The thirteenth is called "Juana," and records an example of conjugal attachment. Juana, mother of the Emperor Charles V., upon the death of her husband, Philip the Handsome of Austria, who had treated her with uniform neglect, had his body laid upon a bed of state, in a magnificent diet; and being possessed by the idea that it would revive, watched it for a length of time incessantly, waiting for the moment of returning life.—The fourteenth is "The American Forest Girl," who rushed into the midst of a band of Indian warriors, as they were about to sacrifice a European captive; and though on other occasions (unlike as a fawn, stood before the victim, and declared, unattended, that she should not die. Struck and overawed, their dark souls bowed before the maid; and their captive was set free.—The fifteenth is a record of constancy;—the sixteenth, of attachment to home and the scenes of childhood;—the seventeenth, of filial piety;—the eighteenth, of female friendship; and the nineteenth is sacred to the memory of a sister poetess—the gentle author of "Psyche." To these "Records" are added a number of "Miscellaneous Pieces," many of which have already appeared in the Magazine, but which we are glad to see reprinted in a separate form.

We have frequently had occasion to speak of Mrs. Hemans' poetical genius, and we have always spoken of it in terms of no mean praise. There seems to be a necessary distinction between male and female poets. The latter do not possess the vigour or variety of the former, but there is often a silvery sweetness in their versification—a rich flowiness in their thoughts—an refinement in their mode of expressing the gentlest affections of our nature, which well atones for the absence of those stronger chords which more masculine spirits strike upon the lyre. The only fault we have to find with Mrs. Hemans, is, that she limits herself too much to a certain range of imagery—that she dwells too much upon a certain set of feelings. With any of her detached poems we are charmed, but in going through the whole volume, we wish sometimes for a little more variety. Yet there is in all her writings a majesty of purity—a moral serenity—a deep spirit of poetry which disarms criticism, because they are always so true to nature and to the mind. We have always to add to our present notice only one short extract, entitled

THE HOMES OF ENGLAND.

"The stately homes of England, How beautiful they stand! Amid their tall ancestral trees, O'er all the pleasant land, O'er all the pleasant land, The dewy dews their greenward bound Three shades and sunny gleam; And there all the past times with the sound Of some rejoicing stream.

"The merry homes of England! Around their hearths by night Was glad some look of household love Meet in the candle-light; There woman's voice flows forth in song, Or childhood's tale is told, Or lips move fondly along Some glorious page of old.

"The blessed homes of England! How softly on their bowers In hush the holy quietness That breathes from Sabbath hours! Solemn yet sweet the church-bell's chime Floats through their woods at morn: All other sounds in that still time Of breeze and leaf are hush!

"The cottage homes of England! By thousands on her plains, They are smiling o'er the silvery brooks And round the laurel fane, Through glowing orchard-forts they peep, Each from his nook of leaves, And feast on these the lowly sheep, At the bed beneath their eaves.

"The free fair homes of England! Long, long in but and hall May hearts of native proof be reared, To guard each hallowed wall! And green forever be the groves, And bright the lowery sod Where first the child's glad spirit loves Its country and its God!
