Dr. Cox, the principal of the grammar school, made out the various papers and their requested some of the teachers to examine the papers of their own pupils. This they refused to do, on the ground that they could not examine as accurately as if they set the examinations themselves. The principal endeavored to get them to yield, but all stood off. So at the school board meeting a letter was read from Dr. Cox stating that Messrs.
Fullerton and Loggie had refused to accept the papers assigned to them.
The members of the board expressed. the opinion that it was small work on the part of those concerned, but ordered that Secretary Stothart and the principal should assign the papers. The teachers agreed to this.
