SURAT'S CHILDREN.
A SEQUEL TO THE DARKENED CASEMENT.

BY GRACE GREENWOOD.

(Concluded.)

Oh, human heart! thou mysterious mystery! thus inexplicable contradiction!—in a brief moment, from the most deep of fissile nature swelled up into a vast, a boundless, a boundless ocean of anguish, and overflowing every bosom, as it were a tight-bottomed boat, in its broadest beam, as though the waves set forth in fragments still stretching to the sky!

With a hurried adieu, and a partial explanation to his friends, Frederic sprang on his horse, and set out for W. in all speed. He had not ridden far before he struck the storm, which had been so long brewing, and was now in full fury. The wind whistled like a thousand voices, and the rain beat like a thousand hammers. The lightning, too, was fierce, and the thunder pealed like a thousand drums. Frederic, however, was not to be daunted by such a tempest; he ploughed his way through the storm, and reached his destination safe and sound.

He had not been long in the room, when his wife, Anne, came in, looking pale and weary. She had been ill all day, and Frederic had been unable to get her to bed, so he had sent for a doctor, and had him come in, and the doctor had told him that she had a fever, and that he must remain in bed.

"She is living sir," said the woman who attended upon her, "but she has been quite unconscious for several hours, and we have no more hope. Her eyes are long closed, and she is breathing heavily; but I am afraid she will die."

"She is living sir," said Frederic, looking at his wife.
