POETRY.

Gentleman Jim.

In the Diamond shaft worked Gentleman Jim,
Handsome of face and stout of limb,
Came in dress; but something in him,
Whether down in the coal mine, soiled and grim,
Or wandering alone in holiday time
Won the love and respect of all in that clime.

He had no sweetheart, he had no wife,
Some mighty sorrow had dimmed his life.
His earnings, hardly won and small,
Were sent to the orphan and the widow's call.

Of those who had perished in shaft or mine,
He was the friend of all living things,
And moving along in those toilsome ways,
He wore the demerol of gentler days.

In April, when the mine fell in,
Beneath the timbers stood Gentleman Jim;
With a giant grasp he flung two of the boys
Clear of the danger. With defensing noise
The shaft gave way on every side;
The boys were safe but Jim—he died;
Died as men die, and will die again,
Giving their lives for their fellow men.

When rocks and timbers were cleared away
And Jim borne up on light of day,
They took from his bosom, stained with blood,
Two withered leaves of a withered bud,
Pinned on a card, "Toute a toi—Marie,"
Was written beneath them; beneath it
On this rolls his heart for years had worn,
Had written "All withheld except the thorn."

What life romance, what story of wrong
This man had locked up in his soul so long,
None who loved him may ever know,
But the tale of his glorious chivalric deed
Shall not perish as long as men hold this creed—
That the hero whose blood for his kind is shed
Wins a deathless fame and an honored bed;
A monument grander than the sculptor's
Or grave.

In the glory that follows the martyr's grave.

SELECT STORY.

GOOD BYE!

BY JOHN STRANGE WINTER.

Five years had gone by—most people had long, long ago forgotten all about what in its time had been called the Adair scandal, and the second Mrs. Adair had been mistress of the house in Grosvenor Street the same length of time as the first one had so resigned.

"What is the story about Adair," a man asked of a friend one day in the Park, after having stood for ten minutes talking to Mrs. Adair, whose carriage was drawn up by the rails.

"The story—oh! he divorced his first wife, that's all," the other man answered.

"Divorced his wife! Oh! he divorced her then?"

"Oh, yes! that was so."

"Did you know her?"

"Oh, yes! I know her well. She was a pretty creature. Never could tell myself how he could stand this one after the first."

"Well, poor devil, he doesn't try to stand anything—he seems to me to let things slide anyhow," said the seeker after knowledge carelessly. "Who was the other?"

"A Miss Deering—parson's daughter of course. Odd thing," said Le Marchant in a musing tone, "that parson's daughters are very much like parson's sons, always the wildest rickets out. Not that Mrs. Adair was wild—not a bit of it; on the contrary, she was one of the gentlest, best-mannered women I ever knew; you might—as far as outside appearances went—have staked your life on her being all right, and yet—she had to divorce her."

"It will cure you."
