House Letters Home.

write home.—Have put it off for four weeks already." This is said as though Sunday were the only possible home-writing day. The well-meaning one goes to his dug-out, and, taking out a fountain-pen, tests it, and discovers it lacks ink. He invades all the adjoining cubicles before finding the necessary full bottle. Conscienceless, he fills his pen, and returns to his own sanctum. By this time the ante-room has emptied, save for two billiards, bored of whom have used their very last of the kitchen fire, and after burning much paper and scorching his fingers, finally gets the pipe going. Then he returns to his room, sits down, and endeavours to marshal his untutored thoughts.

After much head-and-arm scratching, a nebulous idea takes shape, and the earnest writer once more assumes his pipe. But there is still no writing-pad. Out he goes again to borrow, and gets softly sworn at by half a dozen recumbent figures in succession, who are almost asleep on their respective beds—books fallen to the floor. At last he secures some paper, sits down solidly in front of it, and for the time seems immersed in deep thought. Then he discovers his pipe is out. Back to the kitchen fire, and after more scorching, the pipe for a second time is satisfactorily lighted. Another leisurely returning to his seat.

"Now, which girl wrote to him last? And what letter should be answered at all costs?" He dives into a small wooden box containing many envelopes, but fails to find the one he is seeking. Searching down once more, the earnest brain-searching is repeated. "At last! A topping idea!" "Dear Violet,—I wrote you a long letter a fortnight ago, and acknowledged all yours up to date. I hope it didn't get torpedooed." Another long pause, and many deep sighs. "A timid knock at the door. "Come in!" Enter an orderly, bearing a message, for which he gets the officer's signature, and then retires. "The message reads: 'The officer detailed for to-day's town picquet is taken ill with influenza. You will therefore take his place. As you are responsible for the personnel of the picquet, you are recommended to see that it is complete without delay.'"

A suppressed curse, a tosser about of things in general, and a leisurely replacing of the fountain pen. "But annoyance suddenly gives place to a sense of infinite relief. Letter-writing is unavoidably postponed for another week!—EX."

Household Notes

It is best not to cover spinach while cooking. Use no fat for soap making that is fit for cooking. All large, hard fruits must be washed before paring. Children should never be allowed rich and heavy preserves. Cookies will keep soft if put into a cloth-lined jar when hot. Saving milk means utilizing every drop that comes into the home. Keep the garbage can covered and you will not attract so many flies. Use meat on the family table just often enough to tempt the appetite.
