

hotels and fine residences, in short every thing but a college or, what is worse, university buildings abandoned to vermin and dust. Such a discovery is not fitted to make a favorable impression upon his mind. The inhabitants of Halifax will be able to avail themselves of the advantages of this college at a third of the expense of others in the country. It will give a stimulus to the schools at present in operation in the capital. There will be attracted from a distance a considerable number of young men, who will live during six or eight months in the city. If the people of Halifax should not prove liberal in their support of this scheme, it will be vain for us to appeal to the country.

We look upon this measure as the seed of a powerful and influential institution of learning that shall raise Nova Scotia from the lowest place in university education, to one of high eminence. Every man, who lends a helping hand at present, will have reason to bless God afterwards that he saw and embraced the present opportunity, and when Dalhousie College shall have become a large university, stimulating all the other colleges in the land, the rich man who gave his hundreds, the man of moderate means, who gave his tens, the farmer, who gave his fives, the poor man who gave his pound, and even the poor widow who gave her mite, will be proud to say to his friends or children: "I assisted in laying the foundation of all this greatness." This work will tell upon future generations, when he is gathered to his fathers.
