

The US-Canadian border is often termed invisible, but in a satellite view it is easily discerned for long stretches. The border here, between the Canadian prairies and the US plains, is as distinct as the edge of a rug on a floor. The line of demarcation reflects the different land use patterns. The intense red is vegetation on mountains.

