Dear Madam:

The new formula is good and the articles are more varied. There might also be a small insert for deaths, since many employees are not always informed when one of their colleagues passes away.

IN REFUTATION OF "ADDICTION TO EXERCISE"

In response to your recent sports story let me say you should not believe tales told by a faddist or psychologist without evidence got "a priori".

The joggers that run in the rain aren't suffering a softness of brain but in true Baptist style and a ghost of a smile believe there's no joy without pain.

For myself, I may jogging foreswear eat my lunch at my desk solitaire when it rains, or in snow eschew braggadocio while craving a taste of fresh air.

For the recycled air of this fort has the odour of cheap ruby port and much purple prose — it's enough to dispose me to get out and try any sport.

Signed
Perspiring Jogger,
Terry Jones.

There is also a need to draw more attention to the problems that we experience at the posts, and show our employers the other side of the coin. Mention might well be made of the exorbitant rents, which might cause staff to be less willing to leave for a posting when they can pay less here, not to mention the income lost by a working spouse when the couple leaves. If you were feeling especially bold, your next survey might be entitled, Postings: are they worth it financially? □
