

phase of disease, with experience in the largest hospitals in Europe, we are in a position to offer hope even in the most aggravated cases.

We do not claim to have any particular medicine which will cure almost every known disease. We treat patients on scientific principles, and in complicated cases have to vary the treatment according to the symptoms.

But for one disease we do claim a SPECIFIC and that is in the one known as Nervous Debility. We might enter into a long explanation of the symptoms and effects of this disease, but of what use would it be? it would only satisfy idle curiosity in those not requiring treatment; and perhaps needlessly alarm those already suffering. Few are so ignorant of the fearful effects of this most terrible affliction, or of its extent, as to make it necessary to enter into particulars. Thousands yearly sink into premature graves from its effects, while thousands more suffer silently, hardly daring to acknowledge even to themselves the fearful misery it entails. Nor is it