condense for the benefit of all whom it may concern.

"About eleven years ago it was," she began, "that I was assisting my father what I could in the haying. While at work I fell heavily on some stones, and hurt my side badly. The pain was so great that I swooned, and had to be carried home. After that I commenced to be sick at every meal, and my chest was very sore and painful. Presently my stomach began to swell, and was so tender on pressure that I could not bear any clothing to be the least snug or tight over it."

"Oh, that might have come from the shock of your fall, might it not? I think it should have passed away in a few days. You were strong and healthy always before that, I assume?"

"But it did not pass away," she said, in her low, gentle way. "The ailment, whatever it was, got worse; and illness is ever a serious thing,
