big drops of rain began to patter on the sand, sending up volumes of dusty steam.

I got to my feet with joy unspeakable. Praise be to Heaven, my cry for help had been heard and answered! I was saved, saved from the vultures and the heaping sands. Man is an insignificant atom in the scale of the universe, yet easily believes himself the object of a special providence. Here were the streams of water in the desert sent for me and for me alone. I wept with awe and gratitude.

The rain came thicker and faster, first a shower and then a deluge. The sun was eclipsed, and the dome overhead seemed to be cracking and rending as at the blast of the last trump. And indeed to me it was little less than a resurrection. Here was water, and water was life. The thunder roared ever nearer and louder till worlds of wrecked matter seemed to be crashing over my head. My ears were tunned by the exploding bolts, and on my face I felt the hot smack of the forked lightning that made the wilderness as a sea of fire. But through it all the beneficent rain came down in sheets, drenching me not merely to the skin, but to the very marrow. With upturned face and open mouth I slaked my baking throat, and as I drank, with ten times the greediness of the fevered drunkard, I could see my horse with his nozzle turned to the pouring skies, as if he, too, were having a saving draught.

stripped. "By my faith, the man who save with his nozzle turned to the pouring skies, as if he, too, were having a saving draught.

Far into the night the storm boomed and poured. While it lasted I lay stretched full length on the soaking sands, slowly turning over and over, so that the blessed flood might enter at every pore. It was impossible to have too much of that, Heaven's gift, and I would not miss a drop of it Nor, while reveiling in the shower bath, did I forget to fill my water-skin against future needs.

Now and again I had glimpses of crouching forms, with eyes that matched the lightning, ready to pounce upon me, but somehow they never came to the string. In the air, too, were wheeling things that would swoop down and then dart off, with a cry of disappointment at finding the expected corpse a living man.

In the early morning the storm died aweg, and the stars came out in a crystalle, dewy azure that was as the cool blue bosom of a summer lake. Not daring to sleep, I lay and looked up at them, meditating at the marvels they must have seen in the course of the countless ages. But though my thoughts were serious enough (and the total course) they were serious enough (and the total course of the countless ages. Not daring to sleep, I lay and looked up at them, meditating at the marvels they must have seen in the course of the countless ages. But though my thoughts were serious enough (and with good reason), they had not the gloom of the night before.

I had leisure to nonder many things besides the stars—such as the strange fate that had led me hither, the perils and hardships that were past, those that might still be to come, the fate of my late companions, and my own present condition. But as you may imagine the subject that was uppermost in my mind was the miraculous meeting with Donald Gordon, for I was convinced that the man on the black horse was none other than he. What in the name of all the wonders had brought him to this strange quarter of the globe, and how came he to be fighting for Yumen Yusel? These were questions I could not answer, perhaps I did not try very hard to answer them, for I was occupied with the cardinal fact that beyond all doubt Donald was in Arabla, that I had seen him face to face, had even spoken to him and got a hurried glance in reply. But for the sudden mishaps of war I would have declared myself to him, and he would have become my friend and protector. In the most unexpected way my mission came near a happy accomplishment, vet, exasperating to think, had failed as utterly as if we had been as wide apart as the poles. The total failure on the verge of so dram: c a success was another cruel stroke of that malicious fortune that pursued me so relentlessly. The total failure on the verge of so dram c a success was another cruel stroke of that malicious fortune that pursued me so relentlessly. But with a spark of the fire that I had thought dead I told myself that I would not be conquered.

Donald Gordon was in Arabia, and I would find him—nay, more, would carry him trium hantly back to Scotland and his friends. As this bold, high project stirred me, I had a vision of two sun-embrowned men, in strange, outlandish garb, arriving in the gloaming at The Elms, and of Isabel, after a moment's mistrust, rushing to greet and embrace them. The delectable imagination inspired me with such heart and energy that I must have expanded inches on the strength of it. The morning broke sweetly over the waste, with a rosy flush, and a sapphire radiance, and a balm that was as a precious cordial to mind and body. The sand sparkled and gleamed like the sea, and the distant mountains stood out a definite blue-black line against the pellucid western horizon.

Revived to a fresh interest in life, I began to consider the means of escape from this wilderness, and so, having dressed my wound with wet rags, I climbed, not without difficulty, into the ging and embracing

He had his way, and indeed it was exceedingly refreshing to be bathed, for I was still more than a trifle feverish. But more soothing and invigorating than the water werethe brother-in cartlaness and compassion of Tabal, rating than the water werethe brotherly gentleness and compassion of Tabal, who seemed to make himself responsible for my safety and comfort.

When we came to recount our experiences since parting I learned that he had passed the night like myself, alone. Like me, he had thought himself doomed, had been saved by the rain, and was looking for human succour when I spled him. We went through our perils again as old soldiers re-fight their battles, and embraced at the conclusion in pure exuberance of joy at being together once more.

separated brothers, both of us naving leaped to the ground in order to get the closer grip.

You may be sure we had each a multitude of questions to ask and answer, but before I would hear anything of Tebal's adventures since our parting, I insisted on looking to his injury. It was bad, he said, but not deadly. Baring his left shoulder very carefully, I found a shattered gunshot wound that gave the flesh a forn and broken appearance, different altogether from the clean cut I had got. I dressed it as gently and as well as was possible with the means at my disposal, a service for which poor Tabal was infinitely grateful.

"We are of different nations and religions, yet surely we are not strangers," he said, embracing me again. "Had I seen thee now for the first time I would have driven this lance through thee. But henceforth it will be turned against him who seeks thy hurt. Tabal, the son of Achmet, swears to me. "Thou art lucky," exclaimed Tabal, with professional pride, when I was stripped. "By my faith, the man who gave thee this hurt knew not his proce. That done, he played the surgeon to me. "Thou art lucky," exclaimed Tabal, with professional pride, when I was stripped. Methinks if I had my weapon upon him as he had his upon thee he would now be food for the kites and hyenas."

"He was clumsy, Tabal," I said, "Clumsy," repeated Tabal, scornful."

Finding ourselve connoiters and prospect's secure, we descended, watered our solves and our horses at a bubbling the professional pride of the kites and hyenas."

"He and we knew the watercourses were not far off. It was midnight, how-ever, ere we had climbed far enough to feel safe for the night, or perhaps the better way to put it is that at midnight I swore I would go no far-ther if the halt cost me my life. Tabal said be thought we might rest So. we had another drink, and threw ourselves on the ground to sleep.
