T

HROUGHOUT its whole career the house of Brown Brothers has been notable for the harmonious relations existing between employer and employees. "Good wages for good work" has been the motto of the establishment, and many an employee has grown gray in its service, working constantly year after year. The same spirit still prevails, and with the two sons of Richard Brown, and assisted by other members of the staff who have been long connected with the establishment, grown up in its service and greatly contributed to its success, possessing a thorough understanding of every detail of the business, and ready to maintain the high traditions of the house in every particular, Brown Brothers will, doubtless, continue long to be what it so long has been, an institution of Toronto.
