called off the strike at the Le Roi mine, and the whole trouble accordingly in that camp is now at an end. Nothing has been gained by either side to the contest, and the community has suffered to such an extent that it will be years before it recovers the healthy prosperous condition which it enjoyed before the struggle, if indeed it ever decomes a really important business centre again. At the time when the strike was inaugurated Rossland had the leading place among the mining camps of the interior not only in reconversation with a spect of its output of ore, but of its importance commercially. Both of these would have continued until its position had become absolutely assured as the tourists.
