A Love Affair

CHAPTER X.

The events of the day were dancing before her like the ever-changing and confusing pieces in a kaleidoscope. She flung herself on the bed just as she was. She must have slept for a time, for she woke with a start, roused by the sound of horses' hoofs.

She sprang from the bed and looked at her watch. It was a quarter to three. She listened, but all was silent. The great house was as still as a tomb. Convinced that she had been mistaken, and had really heard nothing she began to undress.

Suddenly she started, and felt hastily and fearfully in the bosom of her dress, then a little cry of distress. Her locket was gone! It had been attached by a very slight gold chain, Australian gold—the links of which might be easily bent or twisted. Where had she dropped it?

She searched her rooms carefully, indeed minutely, but it was not to be found. If, then, she had dropped it, she must have done so in one of the rooms down stairs, in the drawing-room or in the hall. The house was perfectly quiet; not a soul was about, or, indeed, probably awake. Why should she not go down, very, very quietly and look for the locket?

Putting on her dressing-gown, she took a candle, and unlocking the door very cautiously, stole out into the corridor. She waited a moment, listening intently, but there was no sound in the vast place excepting the ticking of the tall, old-fashioned clock in the hall, and treading on tiptoe, she stole down the stairs, examining each foot of her way.

She crossed the hall and reached the drawing-room, and went instantly to the chair in which she had sat listening to Mr. Hendrick. Going on her knees, she searched every inch of the thick carpet in the vicinity, but the locket was not there. With a sigh and a choking sensation in her throat that was a presage of a burst of tears, she rose and went to the candle upon the table, and then, when she started and stood upright, with an awful thrill of horror running through her.

She was facing the great French window, and she heard, or fancied she heard, a sound as if a door had turned, or tried to turn, the handle. For a second she stood spell-bound, staring with distended eyes at the window; then to her horror she saw the curtains wave to and fro, and the door open.

Moved by an instinct more than anything else, she blew out the candle, and darted behind the heavy curtains which hung at the division of the two rooms. Clinging to these to prevent herself from falling, she fought hard for courage and presence of mind.

He put his arm around her and supported her. "Great Heaven!" he exclaimed. "You, Constance!" Then, before she could speak, he seized her arm again.

"Be silent!" he said, in a low voice, not so sternly, as with an intensity of emotion that made her feel of anger. "Be silent! Do not call out! Let me look again! Yes, it is you! What are you doing here?" he demanded, his dark eyes fixed on her white face.

Constance fought hard for calmness, but staggered slightly and would have fallen if he had not held her so tightly. He put his arm around her and supported her. "I came," she began. "How long have you been here?" he asked in a low voice full of significance.

"I do not know," she replied, struggling against the terrible faintness that threatened to overcome her. "You do not know? Did you see where you were when I came in?" he glanced toward the window.

"Yes," she said, and raised her eyes to his. His did not falter. "You were? Where were you? Do not be alarmed," and he smiled; but it was an awful smile in Constance's eyes. "There behind those curtains," she replied. He did not speak nor express any surprise, but seemed to be grasping the situation.

"Then you saw the man who was here?" she inquired. "And heard every word we said?" he asked again. "Yes, my lord," she replied. "And you—listened?" he murmured, with a look of infinite pain which stung Constance to the heart.
