CHAPTER XIV.

"No one but an artist can do justice to the green lanes of 'merrie England," "thought Lady Iris as she walk ed through the long lane called the Lover's Lane, outside King's Forest.

She had been visiting her poor, and had driven over in her little basketcarriage with its usual load of good things for their benefit. That morning she had been somewhat longer than usual, as there were a greater number of people ill, and, thinking don Arms, and had then walked on to her favorite haunt, the Lover's Lane. She had a real affection for the place, out passing through it.

The lane was entered from the highread that led to King's Forest, and purse; but, when she saw the evil woods. It was a lovely spot, a place for lovers to tell love stories in, for a poet to cull sweet fancies, or for happy children to play in. Lady Iris looked from the prostrate footpad to her preserver, and her eyes rested upon the handsomest man she had ever seen, a man with a dark noble-looking face. He raised his hat and bowed, while the tramp mouned
