He knew, from having been present when it was discussed in Council and from conversations he had had with members of the Government, more especially with the First Minister, that it was the earnest desire of the Government to construct the road, their faith and the faith of the country being pledged to it. He admitted the spirit of independence which the members of the Senate had exhibited in this debate, but he would like to see not only independence but consistency displayed. On two pravious occasions the Senate had formally declared in favor of the construction of this road when it was proposed that a company should build it. The attempt to have it built by a subsidized company had failed and the Government therefore wished to undertake the work themselves.
