BEAR RIVER

NIAGARA WATER POWER SHORTAGE. Canada's Hydro-Electric Resources Sure to be of Immense Value in Future. The immense possibilities of Canada's water powers is again strikingly illustrated by the power shortage at Niagara Falls on both sides of the river. The man in the street has frequently been told that the power which it is possible to develop from waters of the Niagara river is practically inexhaustible, and now he is faced with statements in the press that "all available power has been used." The apparent contradiction is explained when it is understood that some 8,000,000 horsepower may, theoretically, be obtained by utilizing all the water and all the fall between lakes Erie and Ontario, but owing to the need for carrying the ice through the river, as well as other		demands, it is absolutely impossible to use even the larger proportion of this 8,000,000 horsepower. Under the Boundary Waters Treaty, Canada is allotted 36,000 cubic feet per second. The present shortage implies that the Treaty water, which has so far been allotted to the various power companies at Niagara Falls has been utilized and the power therefrom marketed. Various factors, hitherto, have resulted in limiting the use of Niagara waters for power purposes, the chief being the widespread sentiment, both in the United States and Canada, for the preservation of the scenic beauties of the Falls and River, which, as is known, have been regarded as a national heritage of the whole people. About one-third of the fall in the Niagara River occurs in the lower rapids. Keen competition is now being evidenced in the attempt to secure development privileges in this lower river. Niagara power on the United		States side is largely consumed by the electro-chemical industries, some of which, of their kind, are the largest in the world. The electro-chemical industries before long will no doubt be seeking other situations. Some such industries are already utilizing large amounts of Canadian electrical energy. There are many large river systems in Canada which permit of the development of power at low cost, and prices which doubtless will compare favourably with the cost of Niagara power. Special problems resulting from seasonal variations in river conditions, as well as difficulties in the distribution of manufactured products will, no doubt be solved satisfactorily by the electro-chemical industries once the time has arrived seriously to deal with this problem of additional supply of power. Then the value of Canada's national water power wealth will be more clearly manifested.—L.G.D. in "Conservation." Minard's Liniment cures Colds, etc.

Mrs. E. H. Porter entertained a party of little girls from 3 to 7 years ago. Consternation seized him as he realized that for some time it had been raining. He got speedily to his feet, "I trust you will excuse me, sir," he said to the shipowner, "and you too, gentlemen, that I leave at such an inopportune time. But I have just recalled that I left my son Henry on London Bridge, with the injunction that he remain there until I return. I fear he is in great distress, unsheltered as he is in this rain. I must go and take him home."

"Nonsense," exclaimed his host. "Why distress yourself about nothing? sit down again, friend. You surely don't expect to find that boy there now after all this time has passed and in this rain, too. Why, that boy has gone home long ago."

But the father confidently shook his head, "He is still there," he replied. "I am certain of it. He is right where I left him, despite the rain. You don't know my Henry. I told him to stay there until my return, and he is there yet."

So he was, spent with fatigue, hungry, drenched to the skin, but never once thinking of deserting the post where he had been told to stay till his father returned. It was this same unflinching obedience, this absolute loyalty, that made him the great soldier that he was.

I think one of the finest points of this story of the boy on the bridge is the father's unswerving confidence in his son, his unshaken conviction of the boy's trustworthiness. More than a hero is the boy whose father can have such steadfast faith in him.

At another time Henry was on his way from school with a crowd of chums. They were importuning him to come for a game of cricket on one of the old fields.

"No," he said steadily, "I can't go."

The 25,000 inhabitants which are credited to Dawson City, Alaska, during the height of the 1898 gold rush, have now dwindled to a mere 2,000.

THE BOY WHO STOOD ON THE BRIDGE

Not Casablanca, as you will readily think; not the boy who perished rather than disobey his father. Yet this was another boy equally as courageous in the line of duty. Though he did not have to face the fiery test of the young French hero made famous for all time by Mrs. Homan's poem, still this other boy, Henry Havelock, had the courage and his faithfulness tested again and again. Every time, like the pure metal he rang true.

Sir Henry Havelock, England's great Christian soldier and hero of the siege of Lucknow, was the son of a wealthy shipbuilder and was born at Ford Hall, in Wearmouth, Sunderland, April 5, 1795. He was the second of four sons. While quite young he began to display those fine traits of character for which he became illustrious in manhood—truthfulness, fearlessness, dependableness, and a steadfast stand on the side of right.

"Henry has never to be forced to obey," his father once said of him. "Obedience, when he realizes that it is right, is as natural to him as breathing. He is one son of whom I do not have to make a request the second time. Neither does he stop to question the why and the wherefore. I am his father; that is enough."

One of the best stories told of Henry Havelock's early boyhood is of the time he stood on London Bridge in a chilling rain, drenched to the skin, yet patient, unflinching, with no thought of moving, because his father had placed him there and told him not to leave until his return.

Henry was only eleven at the time, just one year older than Admiral Louis Casablanca's heroic young son, Louis Jr. Henry was always delighted when he could go walking with his father, though his father was of a somewhat absent turn of mind and would sometimes get so absorbed in business care as to forget the presence of the sturdy little chap plodding beside him.

On the afternoon of which the story tells, just as they came to London Bridge, Mr. Havelock suddenly remembered a matter of business at one of the stationer's. So he said to Henry, whom he left on the bridge: "Remember now, don't move away; but stay right here until I return. This he said to his son for fear the little fellow might wander away and get lost in the crowds.

At the stationer's Mr. Havelock met an old friend, a gentleman who owned a line of ships plying between London and foreign ports. The finest ship of the line had just come in. The gentleman was eager for Mr. Havelock to inspect it. He finally consented; for while they talked, the father had forgotten all about the little son he had left to await his return on London Bridge.

The ship was a beauty, and Mr. Havelock grew enthusiastic over its many fine points. Then a collation was spread to which he and others who had come at the shipowner's invitation were easily induced to sit down.

Suddenly, in the very midst of the feast, there flashed upon Mr. Havelock remembrance of the boy he had left on the bridge full two hours ago. Consternation seized him as he realized that for some time it had been raining. He got speedily to his feet, "I trust you will excuse me, sir," he said to the shipowner, "and you too, gentlemen, that I leave at such an inopportune time. But I have just recalled that I left my son Henry on London Bridge, with the injunction that he remain there until I return. I fear he is in great distress, unsheltered as he is in this rain. I must go and take him home."

"Nonsense," exclaimed his host. "Why distress yourself about nothing? sit down again, friend. You surely don't expect to find that boy there now after all this time has passed and in this rain, too. Why, that boy has gone home long ago."

But the father confidently shook his head, "He is still there," he replied. "I am certain of it. He is right where I left him, despite the rain. You don't know my Henry. I told him to stay there until my return, and he is there yet."

So he was, spent with fatigue, hungry, drenched to the skin, but never once thinking of deserting the post where he had been told to stay till his father returned. It was this same unflinching obedience, this absolute loyalty, that made him the great soldier that he was.

I think one of the finest points of this story of the boy on the bridge is the father's unswerving confidence in his son, his unshaken conviction of the boy's trustworthiness. More than a hero is the boy whose father can have such steadfast faith in him.

"No," he said steadily, "I can't go."

PILES.

You will find relief in Zam-Buk! It eases the burning, stinging pain, stops bleeding and brings ease. Persistence with Zam-Buk means cure. Why not prove this? All Druggists and Stores—60c. box.

I promised my father I would never go there to play. He has a reason for wishing me to avoid the place.
"O come on. Don't be a loony. Henry turned upon the speaker, his eyes flashing: "But I'll know it," he said.

Happy is the boy who goes straight, not because of fear of discovery if he turns off the right course, but because of his own fine sense of honor.

When he was sent to the relief of Lucknow, after he had proved himself one of England's most fearless soldiers, Havelock was reminded again and again by the officers associated with him how well-nigh hopeless was the task. It did indeed seem that naught but a miracle could take the little army commanded by Havelock through the swarming lines of Sepoys and into the beleaguered city.

But Havelock had been told to cut his way through at any price to the rescue of the besieged men, women, and children. He had no other thought but to obey. The queen herself had said: "Send Havelock. If any man can reach them, he can." Another splendid tribute to the man, who, as a boy, had learned the lesson of obedience and faithfulness.

Day after day the little army fought its way onward, its ranks constantly diminished by Sepoy bullets and by disease. Behind Havelock and his men were the awful scenes at Cawnpore, which they had not reached till after the massacre. Before them were the swarming, blood-thirsty Sepoys and mile after mile of inhospitable country. No one realized more keenly than Havelock himself how desperate was the undertaking. But day after day, when in the council of officers he was advised, his answer was ever the same: "We must go on. They are depending on us—those men, women, and children in Lucknow. We can't have another Cawnpore through any shirking of duty on our part." And go on he did, patiently, persistently, never flinching; never so much as entertaining a thought of turning back; steadfast, unswerving in the trust committed to them.

Finally, his ranks pitifully thinned by exhaustion, by disease, and by bullets, Havelock was compelled to return to Cawnpore to await reinforcements. His army strengthened, again came the order to march to the relief of Lucknow, which still held out against the Sepoys, but was in desperate straits. Though disease had seized him now as its victim, he never thought of making it an excuse to quit his post.

The successful attempt to reach Lucknow was successful, though not accomplished till after many days of heroic endurance and of desperate fighting. We may well believe that, as the overjoyed men, women and children of the Lucknow garrison hastened to proclaim their gratitude to the man whose unswerving stand at the post of duty had delivered them from the horrible fate of Cawnpore, the heart of the great soldier was thrilled by the thought that all these precious lives were his reward for steadfastness. We may believe too that it made him glad to remember that he had learned the splendid lessons of courage and faithfulness in his boyhood.
