Miss Courts And Her Young Man.

It is a queer thing if a dear sweet maiden lady of sixty-two and a nice young man of twenty-nine, cannot get married if they feel disposed to do so—but it appears they cannot, at least in England, that home of the free. Everything on both sides is agreeable—Miss Courts is good and rich, and Mr. Bartlett is handsome and polite—then pray why shouldn't they be made one? The action of the press, in assuming a paternal attitude and peremptorily forbidding the banns is a phenomenal exhibition of cheek, and indicates the danger of encouraging the modern growth of "society" journalism. Garr extends his sympathy to the Baroness, and would advise her to go on with the show, notwithstanding these impertinent intruders into private affairs, whose long noses deserve to be sharply twisted.

Cooks are said proverbially to have tempers, and the rival claimants for the most successful cookery of the public accounts exemplify the proverb. "You know you cooked them, you hussey," said Mrs. Carrington to her rival. Mrs. C. having had the misfortune to lose her place as cook to Mrs. Canada, was very ill-tempered, and having the best command of language was too much for her in this dialogue. "And if I did, you mean thing, you were the first to begin it," retorted Mrs. Tilley. There was a sad use of bad language and a grievous loss of temper on the part of the two respectable old ladies.
