

The first of these is the fact that the medical profession is a closed shop. The entry of new practitioners is restricted by the requirements of medical school graduation and licensure. This creates a natural barrier to entry and tends to create a sense of exclusivity. The second factor is the historical tradition of the medical profession as a guild. This tradition has been passed on to the present and has resulted in a strong sense of loyalty and solidarity among medical practitioners. The third factor is the high cost of medical education and training. This creates a significant barrier to entry and tends to create a sense of exclusivity. The fourth factor is the high status of the medical profession. This status is based on the historical tradition of the medical profession as a guild and on the high cost of medical education and training. This status tends to create a sense of exclusivity and a strong sense of loyalty and solidarity among medical practitioners. The fifth factor is the high level of specialization in the medical profession. This specialization tends to create a sense of exclusivity and a strong sense of loyalty and solidarity among medical practitioners. The sixth factor is the high level of competition in the medical profession. This competition tends to create a sense of exclusivity and a strong sense of loyalty and solidarity among medical practitioners. The seventh factor is the high level of risk in the medical profession. This risk tends to create a sense of exclusivity and a strong sense of loyalty and solidarity among medical practitioners. The eighth factor is the high level of responsibility in the medical profession. This responsibility tends to create a sense of exclusivity and a strong sense of loyalty and solidarity among medical practitioners. The ninth factor is the high level of autonomy in the medical profession. This autonomy tends to create a sense of exclusivity and a strong sense of loyalty and solidarity among medical practitioners. The tenth factor is the high level of prestige in the medical profession. This prestige tends to create a sense of exclusivity and a strong sense of loyalty and solidarity among medical practitioners.