

who have been specially trained as social workers, or those business men who have had a long experience in this special work, are easily the best qualified. Only recently I heard a business man boast that he had fed the unemployed on six cents a day. It can't be done, and if it is attempted the morale of the men must be completely destroyed. One of the greatest problems coming out of the long-continued economic depression is the maintenance of morale among those who are suffering so severely. This is best accomplished if the direct relief is administered by trained workers, who have had experience in handling the difficulties of the situation.

I have every sympathy with you in the gigantic burden you are carrying. I wish you good health and every success.

Ever yours faithfully,

Principal
