

brown, or chestnut color, his complexion fair, his eyes dark gray, and so bright and piercing, that almost every one who saw him seems to have been struck with their resemblance to those of an eagle. His forehead was high and broad, his nose inclining to aquiline, the mouth and chin small, and very finely cut; while nothing could be more resolute, or more indicative of cool and composed courage than the expression of his whole face.

Like most others on whom Nature has bestowed a pleasing exterior, Dr. Kane was disposed to set off his person by all the advantages of dress; and, while projecting an Arctic Expedition, he did not forget to keep his hair in curl, and to choose becoming vest-patterns. His deportment was modest, even to shyness, and he could not be brought to converse on his own achievements, or the honors which had been paid to them. He talked rapidly, but with a sententious brevity and curt-ness of expression, while all his motions betrayed the restlessness of his disposition.

Besides the narratives of his two arctic voyages, Dr. Kane was the author of various scientific treatises and several lectures, on subjects connected with polar exploration.
