"As an impartial, lively and judicious critic the reputation of Mr. Hazlitt stands unrivalled among modern writers, and the present volume cannot fail to prove a most welcome supplement to the works of this attractive writer published in this series."—New Bedford Mercury.

"Hazlitt's great fame as a critic will render praise of the nice discrimination, genuine feeling, and honesty of this work superfluous. It is among the best of his efforts."—N. Y. Evangelist.

"Another number of the same popular and useful series. It is the production of one of the most discriminating and elegant minds of the age, and is distinguished alike by the justness of its criticisms, and the rich vein of warm and glowing feeling that pervades it."—Albany Atlas.

"These Lectures are very entertaining, and contain admirable criticisms on all the great comic writers, down to the commencement of the nineteenth century, besides a capital essay on Wit and Humor. The author has truly 'performed a good office by telling us the manner of being pleased.'"—Cincin. Atlas.

"These Lectures have had a great run in England, and deservedly so, for the present copy is taken from the third London edition. They are on Wit and Humor—on Shakspeare and Ben Jonson, &c., &c., forming altogether, a fund of interesting facts and anecdotes concerning some of the most noted writers, not to be found elsewhere."—Auburn Journal.

"He was the most readable of writers. The paper on Hogarth is one of the finest things in the English language. This is a work that no man of the present day could write; one, too, which is a model of the best order of criticism. Hazlitt was a writer you did not merely read—you learnt his words—he was a man to quote."—Sunday Times.

"The discriminative criticisms on the 'Tatler,' 'Spectator,' and other essayists—on Hogarth, the Comic Dramatists, and on the later comic writers, are all well worthy of study. On the whole, we hope no reader of ours will fail to possess the book, as much from its philosophical spirit as for its fund of amusement."—Westminster Review.

"We apprehend that our 'Comic Writers,' and the list is a noble one, will be read with a keener relish and finer appreciation of their beauties, by those who will take the trouble to read these eloquent and pleasing Lectures."—Britannia.
