importance in a baby's first chothes. Even when the cost need not be limited, the utmost simplicity should be observel. Let the fineness of the material and work bear evidence of the mother's means rather than elaborate trimming. There are many different materials of-fered for baby's clothes, but longcloth, nainsook and batiste are the best. These are all soft finished materials and laun-

I have already told you my preference for the yoke-less or one-piece dress. This is a simple little affair that any person can make; and when it is daintily tucked and perhaps beautified by a little hand embroidery it is as pretty a garment as one could wish. Featherstitching is another favorite adornment for baby clothes and is always effective. Most mothers nowadays avoid frills even at the neck and wrists, preferring a casing, and drawing the fulness up with a narrow tape. In putting the band on any little dress, always hold the neck of the garment toward you and the band away from you. To be especially dainty, of course, the entire garment should be made by hand; but at any rate always finish the neck, armholes and wrists with hand sewing. It is a softer and more pliable finish than machine sewing. It is a good plan on dress and petticoat side seams to run the seams first on the machine then trim the raw edges, turn under and sew the French seam by hand. The dress when I have already told you my preference

THREE-PIECE SUIT.

The matelasse, of which this suit is made, is so decorative in itself that the plain lines of the design are well adapted to it. The color is dull grayish amethyst, and is maintained throughout the trimming, bittons and cords.

The jacket is cut on the lines most favored this season and closes with buttons and loops made of plain grosstrain silk. These were represented on the machine then trim the raw edges, turn under and sew the French seam by hand. The dress when finished should measure twenty-six inches in length.

In selecting flannel for the petticoats, choose a moderate weight of French flamel. The very heavy weights become too close in texture after repeated washing. I prefer the "gertrude" style of petticoat, made without yoke or arm holes, but fastened on the shoulder by tiny pins. Some mothers claim however, that this style works up under the arms, and that the petticoat made on a waistband fits more comfortable. It is the baby who is constantly held in the arms whose clothes get up around its neck and leave the wee legs bare to the mercies of colic.
