A CHARMING GOWN FROM LONDON

Skirts full and sashes re-fringed, one of the latest models in the drawing rooms of old London this season. The general abandoning of the corset by the leaders of fashion in London and Paris has naturally led to a fuller treatment about the hips. The pretty lace effect around the shoulders is always a feature.

The Right Age To Marry

By COMPTON MACKENZIE
 Author of "Carnival" and "Sinister Street"

There always seems a strange perversity in the fact that most of our modern remedy-mongers or, if you will, reformers propose to cure the ills of marriage by unlocking the stable door after the horses have been burnt to death. It is always the marriage laws that are imperfect, and one is left to suppose that the people who marry are without fault. The last point that is made in any discussion of divorce-law reform is the irrational way in which men and women marry.
 Take first of all the cases of the average girl.
 It does not matter whether it is or is not economic pressure that causes her to adopt matrimony as a dishonorable profession.
 Apart from all material circumstances, marriage stands out in the life of every uneducated young woman as the sacred goal of her aspirations. The secret dread of normal womanhood over all the world is the possibility of man refusing to take up his voluntary obligation. Therefore, women, who are by nature unselfish creatures, universally drop the facts of marriage in a profusion of outpoured sentiment. Sentiment, they know, is the bait to attract men who are by nature violently sentimental. Marriage is the Magna Charta of womanhood, and every man is a potential King John.
 And indeed he is a veritable King John. Every man instinctively dreads marriage. For a large number of men marriage means the voluntary acceptance of a burden; for a large number of women it means the only obvious path to freedom. An early marriage by a man makes the world pity him; an early marriage by a woman brings congratulations. It may or may not have been Shakespeare who, writing under a sense of personal failure, first advised every woman to marry a man older than herself. Anyway the superstition dies hard. I wish one could acquire the true statistics of unhappy marriages. I do not mean divorce court records; they merely represent the unendurable marriages. I would wager that the percentage of happy marriages gets higher as the husband and wife approximate in age, and is highest of all when the woman is slightly older than the man. I am not trying to balance myself on a paradox. The proposition will bear examination. To appeal to my own experience and observation were useless. Controversy should take no account of mere assertion. But logically the premises seem unassailable.
A Man's Emotions at Thirty
 The life of a young man is nearly always a gradual progression towards a state of emotional ease. Somewhere about thirty he settles down emotionally. Intellectually he almost always settles down when he leaves school. When emotion burns itself out sentiment rises from the ashes. Now sentiment is very easy to instil and very difficult to eject. Hence the legend that a man of thirty knows his own mind. As a matter of fact he is just beginning to forget all he ever knew. At this point, the man who is a sentimentalist, begins to feel the force of egotism and debates the solution of his personality in marriage. He makes matrimony a duty. He seeks an ideal figure in whom he may enshrine his sentiment. Then he marries.
 The life of a young woman is also a gradual progression towards a state of emotional ease. But in her case the advance is slower, and she usually marries on the first rung. It is not surprising that sex antagonism displays itself. To answer any objections to this unequal arrangement, man has invented a theory that he remains younger than a woman. Physically this is false, and psychologically this is false; indeed the only justification for such a proposition seems to rest on the fact that men remain younger in appearance than women—an accident generally due to the stress of motherhood and the deto see heads broken than institutions; heads are very much easier to mend.

 In Ogdon, Penn., is the largest flower bed in the world, covering more than 60 acres. Only one variety of asters are grown, entirely for seed, of which there will be more than a ton.
 A horse which tumbled into a pit in York, Penn., was rescued by corn fodder, which was thrown down from spread under him until the pit was filled and the horse raised to the level of the ground. The work took several hours, during which time the horse kept eating the fodder.
 For mutual misunderstanding. I do not believe it. You can see the result in America. I do not admire the matrimonial attitude of American women. Nor do I see that the American marriage laws, which are largely experimental, have been successful. Girls and boys require a period of seclusion. The lowest savages recognise this as a necessity; this cloister period might be perfectly served by our existing boarding-schools. From such a seclusion both girls and boys will enter the world and encounter each other more freshly and more naturally. But when the time is ripe for the encounter, mock modesty, parental unwholesomeness, economic prudence, and all the barriers that are erected half jealously by age should be knocked down. Self-deception is the bane of England. The English are not conscious hypocrites; they simply have a pitiful terror of the truth. England is the emotional ostrich burying her head in the intellectual desert of self-deception.
 So long as marriage remains to women a profession and to men a refuge, so long will there be complaint about the anomalies of divorce. Marriage is the mirror of two personalities, and when they dislike the reflection they try foolishly to alter the frame. The sanctity and inviolability of marriage can only affront humanity when humanity feels itself to be unworthy of a self-imposed ideal. Personally, I would always prefer
