INSURING THE ROYAL LIVES

Aggregating $9,000,000—King George and the Kaiser Have Heavy Insurance.

While the coronation, with its brilliant functions and festivities, must cause money to circulate freely among all classes of the trading community during the months of May, June and July, it must not be forgotten that any unforeseen event which led to its postponement or abandonment would cause serious losses which can only be covered by insurance, says a writer in Answers.

Very curious are the developments in connection with the lives of the King and other prominent members of our royal family. It was alleged that quite £30,000 was lost by the publishers of prayer books owing to the death of King Edward, necessitating various changes in royal names, &c., mentioned therein. Publishers of such books, which are liable to alteration with the advent of a new King and Queen, usually take out policies to cover this risk. Probably few are aware that not only do private persons insure themselves against contingent loss, but insurance companies also do the same whenever they issue a policy on a life of any royal personage for a big amount.

The risk is divided among a certain number of offices, for few companies care to undertake more than £40,000 or £50,000 on a single policy, although policies for £100,000, £150,000, and even £250,000 are written for private individuals.

Most monarchs, Princes and millionaires are strong advocates of insurance, which they regard as the safest form of investment. The tariff of the death duties on the life of the King is £1,000,000, and our King nearly £1,000,000. One American plutocrat is insured for £100,000 to £250,000.

An important feature of such personal insurance is that no speculative policies are legal, so that should any claim be made the company issuing the policy can decline to pay out.
