

There is a possibility that at some time there was dislodgement of one or more pigment-bearing cells from a normal situation which subsequently became arrested at a distant point. In this way we may account for the occurrence of secondary melanoma in an internal organ where no primary tumor actually exists. Of course, this theory is open to the criticism that the primary focus had escaped search.