Bolshevism and Barbarism

A most curious and penetrating little essay on the "hard work and no comfort" conditions now prevailing in Moscow is given in a communication to the "Times." It is more than hinted that this state of excessive hardship is part of a Communist policy. An attempt is being made to force an altogether new type of citizen—old trained to welcome privation. Old people, it is said, are seldom seen in Moscow, and the younger generation has no experience of any other life. They have to be content with the barest means of existence, and are taught that any comforts enjoyed outside Russia are in the wicked hands of those who oppress the proletariat. A story told of one of the fortunates who have retained any of their property illustrates the general wretchedness most vividly. He has access to three rooms in his former mansion, but a part of one is boarded off for the use of twenty university students. Their privileges are an iron bedstead covered with a few rags apiece, one meal a day at the university, and the equivalent of five shillings a week which to keep themselves. A couple of statements complete the picture:

The Child of the Future
"The enlarged outlook given to the teaching of such subjects as history will encourage the child of the future to see things not merely from a national or even imperial standpoint, but also from a world point of view," says the Times Educational Supplement.

"It seems probable that by the time he or she goes to school such international questions as the Federation of the Empire or the Consolidation of the League of Nations will have become of importance.
