CHAPTER III-GOING ASHORE.

CHAPTER III—GOING ASHORE.

'Well, Andrew,' remarked the youth first-mentioned, as he turned to the figure in hodden-grey,' how do you like the appearence est our destination? A noble looking country! isn't it?

'Fearfu' rocky, Maister Fergus.'

'Ah!' suddenly interrupted the other, and raising his hand for a moment from the dog's head to shake his fore finger admonishingly. 'You are forgetting already. Remember my name here for the present is Mr. Hargreave.'

'I made a mistake, sir,' returned Andrew, apologetically. 'I'm sure I'll dae a that I can tae mind it, but it's ganna be a kittle business, and it wall be a thousand wonders if I dinna sometimes let the cat oot the pock.'

'Keep the mouth of the pock well tied, and it won't get out,' laughed the other.

'That's as muckle as to say hand yertongue,' rejoined Andrew. 'And, faith, I doot there will be naething else for't, because, ye see, the ither comes natural tae me, after a dizzen years' practice, but Maister Hargreave isna yet a week and. I'll bate ye now if ye was tae change the name o' Dash there, ye wad ca' him aftner by the auld name than the new ane.'

'Perhaps I would,' laughed Hargreave

new ane.'
'Perhaps I would,' laughed Hargreave again 'Well, I know it is difficult, but you must your best. You know the purpose of my visit to Ireland, and it would in all likelihood be frustrated if my true name was known. This would be a pity for it may be of the utmost importance that I should be able to move about as a for it may be of the utmost importance that I should be able to move about as a perfect stranger.'

'Sae it micht, sir—sae it micht; and, as I said afore, I'll dae my best. Well, ye was axin me what I thocht o' the bit o' Ireland we see afore us. It's fearful wild, but no sae grand as the Ochils or the Lammermurs. If the coast o' East Lothian had a wheen rugged hills lyin' up ayont the cliffs it wad be jist sic anither as that. Preserve us, the wind is risin' tae an awtu' pitch.'

'Mr. Hargreave,' said the captain, coming forward to where they stood, 'yonder, a little way ahead of us, is the part of the coast where you wish to land in your boat, but don't you think the might is too stormy for such a venture.'

'Are you of opinion that the attempt would be dangerous?' asked Hargreave, looking at the rising sea and the darkening sky.'

'Well perhaps not dangerous to ex-would be dangerous? asked Hargreave, looking at the rising sea and the darkening sky.

'Well perhaps not dangerous to experienced sailors,' returned the officer, 'but unless you and your servant are well practised in the management of a boat in all weathers," I think it would be imprudent. First of all and chiefly, the coast is dangerous, and you are perfect strangers to it. Sharp rugged rocks lie out from the cliffs in all directions, and it will soon be too dark tor you to see them. Then, in addition, an ugly storm is evidently brewing. It may not-come on to a tremendous blow for a few hours, but I'm much mistaken if we are not underbare pale poles before midnight.'

'I am certainly very anxious to get landed at this point,' said Hargreave.—
'To go with you to Youghal will be to prolong our journey very much. On the whole, I think I'll venture. Andrew and I are not novices at yachting, and here's Dash will swim for the whole of us if we are capsized.'

Dash pricked up his ears, looked eagerly into his master's face, and wagged his tail in a most unmistakable affirmative.

'Plase, sur, do ye mane to go ashore his tail in a most unmistakable affirmative.

'Plase, sur, do ye mane to go ashore here?' asked a voice from the other side of Andrew, who, with the others, turned round, and saw the Irish youth we have mentioned. He had meved towards them, and was regarding Hargreave with eyes sparkling with eager anticipation.
'I am anxious to do so,' returned the latter, good humouredly, for the speaker's appearence pleased him. 'Our good captain, however, is doubtful of the prudence of such a step.'

'I'll go with you sir,' returned the Irishman hastily, and in a tone of animation. 'I know every rock and cave in the bay, and could steer you in blindfolded a most.'

"Hilloa I but I don't know if I can allow my passengers to desert the ship in this way," laughed the captain. "Your name as entered in the books is, I think, Terry Cushaleen?"

this way, laughed the captain. 'Your name as entered in the books is, I think, Terry Cushaleen?'

'That's my name, sur, and a purty Irish one it is. You see, captain, I'vebeen away in furrin' parts for the matter of six years, I'm back agin, maneing to live and die in ould Ireland. Just over them three peaks, that you can't see now for the clouds, down in the valley ayont, my father and sister lives, on the Dundarra estate, an' I'd give more than you'd believe to land just there, and not be going round all the way by Youghal.'

'But what about your luggage?' remarked the captain. 'We can't find it for you just now.'

'There's not a bit o' matter,' answered Terry. 'I haven't got much—just three boxes; and if your honour would take the trouble to see them on to Barney Magee's waggon, he'll lay them off nate and handy at "my father's cabin door.

'All right; I'll undertake the business,' rejoined the captain, with alacrity. In fact,' he added, turning to Hargreave, 'I would rather that Terry should go with you than not, since he knows the coast so intimately With him on board, your boat will be all the better manned.'

'You may safely trust me, your honour,' said Terry, earnestly. 'Who should know the bay better than the boy who had a boat on it for nigh fifteen years?'

'No one, I should think,' replied I'argreave. 'And so, Terry, you can go with us, ahd welcome.'

HATS.—A rather fast fashion is taking root in Edinburgh, said to be transplanted from "the Derby." Not content with slipping an ivy leaf or a peacock's feather into the band of sombre black, the bands themselves are liveried in every colour, one of the favorite ribbons being the tricolour of France—blue, white, and red. But the innovation does not stop, with the decorative bandeau; the hats thusselves are self-coloured in bright tinctures, scarlet, blue, and yellow. The caps and jackets on a race course enliven the spectacle, and why not relieve the everlasting monotony of black and white, or rather grey, in the motley street thoroughfares?

charged Feter O'Shilivan with having shot a Newfoundland dog belonging to him, on Thursday last. The dog he had brought with him from Toronto, in which city he had been offered $10 for it. The defence set up by the defendant was that the dog was chasing his geese, which were in the water in Mr. Elmslie's old quarry. He had tried to frighten him away by throwing stones at him, but failing to effect his purpose by this means he brought a gun and shot him. In doing so, however, he forgot one important fact, namely that geese are not allowed to "gabble o'er the pools" in town. He was therefore adjudged to pay the owner of the dog $5, and the costs besides.
