

Fountain Head of Life Is The Stomach

A man who has a weak and impaired stomach and who does not properly digest his food will soon find that his blood has become weak and impoverished, and that his whole body is improperly and insufficiently nourished.

Dr. PIERCE'S GOLDEN MEDICAL DISCOVERY makes the stomach strong, promotes the flow of digestive juices, restores the lost appetite, makes assimilation perfect, invigorates the liver and purifies and enriches the blood. It is the great blood-maker, flesh-builder and restorative nerve tonic. It makes men strong in body, active in mind and cool in judgement.

This "Discovery" is a pure, glyceric extract of American medical roots, absolutely free from alcohol and all injurious, habit-forming drugs. All its ingredients are printed on its wrapper. It has no relationship with secret nostrums. Its every ingredient is endorsed by the leaders in all the schools of medicine. Don't accept a secret nostrum as a substitute for this time-proven remedy or worse composition. Ask your pharmacist. They must know of many cures made by it during past 40 years, right in your own neighborhood. World's Dispensary Medical Association, Dr. R. V. Pierce, Pres., Buffalo, N. Y.

OPTICAL
My record of over 1,000 school children in Boston and vicinity fitted to glasses should be sufficient guarantee of my worth in the line of work. No child should enter school without a careful test for eye troubles. Consultation free. See me at Harwood's Jewelry Store, 124-A Eighth Avenue West.

Geo. H. Quaid

WINTER SEASON, 1st October to 30th April following, the delivery is tri-weekly.

Season, Monthly
70 lbs. weekly $12.00 $2.50
140 lbs. weekly $24.00 $5.00
210 lbs. weekly $36.00 $7.50
20 per cent. Discount for cash in advance on season orders only.

THE ALBERTA ICE COMPANY, LTD.
Phone 2633
705 2nd St. West, Thomas Block

What are the two brands of Scotch Whiskey that are most popular, judging by our sales?

The name of one begins with W, and ends with ten, the other is the name of a king.

The first person who will bring to our store the right answer on Tuesday Morning, October 15th at 10 a.m. will receive gratis a bottle of Watson No. 10, the second a bottle of King George 4th, the third a bottle of Watson No. 10, the fourth a bottle of King George 4th.

The Calgary Wine & Spirit Co.
113 Eighth Avenue W.

EXTENDING THE FRANCHISE

Says the Vancouver World:

There is one sign of the progress of public opinion in recent years which cannot fail to be marked by the historian. The proposal to give votes to women is meeting with very determined opposition in some quarters, which is rather surprising, seeing that for many years past the proposal to extend the franchise in any and every direction would almost seem to evoke nothing but apathetic indifference.

It would be pleasant to be able to believe that there is a general conviction that since Mr. W. E. Forster's Education Act the people are so educated that they can be trusted with the vote, and that whatever their "property" qualification they have intelligence enough to understand political questions and vote according to their convictions.

It was very different before "the schoolmaster was abroad" to use the well known phrase which so stirred our fathers. Read the splendid pages of Conan Doyle and Stanley Weyman, and more vividly than any history, you will find depicted the fierce and passionate bitterness which was roused by the Franchise Bill of 1832.

Many are old enough to remember that such bitterness was again exhibited in 1867 and 1868. The Liberal Franchise Bill of 1867 was defeated, and this Disraeli, with political lack of anything like honest scruples, and with masterful magnetic personality, forced his followers to pass a much stronger and more liberal measure.

Again in 1884 a Franchise Bill created tumult and excitement, street processions and wild demonstrations such as have only been seen in recent years in connection with strikes and "labor unrest."

It is difficult to understand how it is that the politics qua politics are treated now with such apathy, and measures are only supported or opposed in proportion as they seem to promise or be deficient in the hopes of material benefit.

Judged by the signs of recent years we should have expected that a franchise bill, even to enfranchise women, would be regarded as like the curse in "The Jackdaw of Rheims"—something which would not make anybody one penny the worse.

WESTERN SUCCESS
Energy, courage, hope and adaptability are the four requisites for ensured success in the West, so says Lady Gay in the Toronto Saturday Night. But read for yourselves:

What does one need to ensure success in the West? Four things, energy, courage, hope and adaptability. Opportunities clamor on every side; in one town there grows a void that only a good baker or confectioner can fill; another pines for a decent laundry; a dentist could make a fortune in a third, and a good seamstress and her machine need never be idle in a fourth.

Housewives who are in touch with affairs know by experience that change in domestic servants may be easily accomplished, and at small expense, by making use of the Want Columns.

But all these people must forget the conveniences and luxuries and amusements of more finished towns, and make up their minds to take things as they are and make the best of them.

As for domestic, they are at a premium, and probably less likely to have the four qualities above mentioned in good working order than anyone. If by some favor of the gods, a housekeeper secure a jewel of a cook or general, she holds her with a wary grasp, and probably in spite of every precaution, she loses her. The man who paints the verandah, or the grocer to whom she gives her patronage, or the station agent who saw her come in, or even the mayor or the bank manager, or anyone at all may get a beating long enough to cook her into matrimony, even if she be plain enough to scare a train off the track.

The West is yet the paradise of the girl who knows how to keep house, and she isn't marooned on a desert of prairie, as she used to be, either, for the myraid little boomtown towns need her and give her a fairly good time, with drives and dances and such like, between the domestic problems which sometimes are so weird and startling as to drive one nearly dotty. The Western woman rises to meet them with a nonchalant and easy nature, which is as admirable as it is surprising to her less adaptable sister from the East. She might have lived in a flat all her life, judging by the way she can contrive and supplement her resources, and she certainly should be canonized among the saints who have "let patience have her perfect work." As she tersely puts it, "Why make a fuss over contraptions when nobody has time to attend to you?" What is the use of the whole matter. There never was a complainer or a fuss without an audience; no one bemoans things in solitude. The women of the West get busy instead, and bravely right what goes wrong.

Good Housekeeping
(By Jane Eddington.)

CREAMED POTATOES
Some one has recently complained in rhyme that travelers of "guests" talk about two things: How comfortable or uncomfortable they were at a given place and "what dangers" they had.

Listen anywhere a number of travelers are having an experience meeting, and see if half their conversation is not about hotels and food! One of my earliest acquaintances on the steamer was a young man who could give entertaining touches to almost anything he attempted to do.

He had served his apprenticeship in description on The Harvard Monthly. In telling me of one of his adventures and hungry return in a street car, he said that he had made up his mind "to blow himself" to a six course dinner and had thought out all he would have to eat—"just figured out to the demi-tasse"—when he saw a sign in a dairy lunch place advertising "extra fine hot waffles."

"I nearly broke the window getting out of that car and into the presence of those waffles," he said, in concluding his account of this adventure.

It is the simple things to eat and the simple diversions that always are the most alluring, and the diversions are often associated with food. The favorite conundrums are often suggested by what is eaten, and even the chance games by which ocean travelers amuse themselves may have the same connection. One of the whist games, has been the curious one of an impromptu guessing—"of how many leaves a pineapple has." It has been said that most people imagine, and for this reason it takes rather a clever person to win.

However, as to simple foods. One of the epicures traveling with us, a real F. F. V. of the Old Dominion, evidently much given to eating and especially to the drinking that goes with a high life (it would have to be high in his case, since he is several inches over six feet tall), describes with greatest gusto some of the dishes, simple ones, he can make and the work of the good cooks he has trained in his day.

He has promised to write me out quite a cook book of his recipes, but since he is, I understand, a director of one of the best known manufacturing companies in the United States and seems to have other interests, I am fearful that I may wait long to get it. At any rate, here are two of the dishes he recommends:

Everything is strict that comes to my mind. One new acquaintance, on finding out my interest, bears it in mind, and whatever new acquaintance he or she makes who lets fall any remarks about eating, my new friend remembers me and does a lot of quizzing for my sake, or introduces me that I may do my own questioning.

If I had time on this moving city and it was as easy to work here as at home, I might learn how they cook and farm and live in Montenegro, Turkey, Russia, etc.

I cannot quite feel that it is courteous to pursue people, so it is mostly the accidental talks that furnish me with some of the inexpressible material on this subject of foods and eating the world over.

Housewives who are in touch with affairs know by experience that change in domestic servants may be easily accomplished, and at small expense, by making use of the Want Columns.

But all these people must forget the conveniences and luxuries and amusements of more finished towns, and make up their minds to take things as they are and make the best of them.

As for domestic, they are at a premium, and probably less likely to have the four qualities above mentioned in good working order than anyone. If by some favor of the gods, a housekeeper secure a jewel of a cook or general, she holds her with a wary grasp, and probably in spite of every precaution, she loses her. The man who paints the verandah, or the grocer to whom she gives her patronage, or the station agent who saw her come in, or even the mayor or the bank manager, or anyone at all may get a beating long enough to cook her into matrimony, even if she be plain enough to scare a train off the track.

The West is yet the paradise of the girl who knows how to keep house, and she isn't marooned on a desert of prairie, as she used to be, either, for the myraid little boomtown towns need her and give her a fairly good time, with drives and dances and such like, between the domestic problems which sometimes are so weird and startling as to drive one nearly dotty. The Western woman rises to meet them with a nonchalant and easy nature, which is as admirable as it is surprising to her less adaptable sister from the East. She might have lived in a flat all her life, judging by the way she can contrive and supplement her resources, and she certainly should be canonized among the saints who have "let patience have her perfect work." As she tersely puts it, "Why make a fuss over contraptions when nobody has time to attend to you?" What is the use of the whole matter. There never was a complainer or a fuss without an audience; no one bemoans things in solitude. The women of the West get busy instead, and bravely right what goes wrong.

Good Housekeeping
(By Jane Eddington.)

CREAMED POTATOES
Some one has recently complained in rhyme that travelers of "guests" talk about two things: How comfortable or uncomfortable they were at a given place and "what dangers" they had.

Listen anywhere a number of travelers are having an experience meeting, and see if half their conversation is not about hotels and food! One of my earliest acquaintances on the steamer was a young man who could give entertaining touches to almost anything he attempted to do.

He had served his apprenticeship in description on The Harvard Monthly. In telling me of one of his adventures and hungry return in a street car, he said that he had made up his mind "to blow himself" to a six course dinner and had thought out all he would have to eat—"just figured out to the demi-tasse"—when he saw a sign in a dairy lunch place advertising "extra fine hot waffles."

"I nearly broke the window getting out of that car and into the presence of those waffles," he said, in concluding his account of this adventure.

It is the simple things to eat and the simple diversions that always are the most alluring, and the diversions are often associated with food. The favorite conundrums are often suggested by what is eaten, and even the chance games by which ocean travelers amuse themselves may have the same connection. One of the whist games, has been the curious one of an impromptu guessing—"of how many leaves a pineapple has." It has been said that most people imagine, and for this reason it takes rather a clever person to win.

However, as to simple foods. One of the epicures traveling with us, a real F. F. V. of the Old Dominion, evidently much given to eating and especially to the drinking that goes with a high life (it would have to be high in his case, since he is several inches over six feet tall), describes with greatest gusto some of the dishes, simple ones, he can make and the work of the good cooks he has trained in his day.

He has promised to write me out quite a cook book of his recipes, but since he is, I understand, a director of one of the best known manufacturing companies in the United States and seems to have other interests, I am fearful that I may wait long to get it. At any rate, here are two of the dishes he recommends:

Everything is strict that comes to my mind. One new acquaintance, on finding out my interest, bears it in mind, and whatever new acquaintance he or she makes who lets fall any remarks about eating, my new friend remembers me and does a lot of quizzing for my sake, or introduces me that I may do my own questioning.

If I had time on this moving city and it was as easy to work here as at home, I might learn how they cook and farm and live in Montenegro, Turkey, Russia, etc.

I cannot quite feel that it is courteous to pursue people, so it is mostly the accidental talks that furnish me with some of the inexpressible material on this subject of foods and eating the world over.

Housewives who are in touch with affairs know by experience that change in domestic servants may be easily accomplished, and at small expense, by making use of the Want Columns.

But all these people must forget the conveniences and luxuries and amusements of more finished towns, and make up their minds to take things as they are and make the best of them.

As for domestic, they are at a premium, and probably less likely to have the four qualities above mentioned in good working order than anyone. If by some favor of the gods, a housekeeper secure a jewel of a cook or general, she holds her with a wary grasp, and probably in spite of every precaution, she loses her. The man who paints the verandah, or the grocer to whom she gives her patronage, or the station agent who saw her come in, or even the mayor or the bank manager, or anyone at all may get a beating long enough to cook her into matrimony, even if she be plain enough to scare a train off the track.

The West is yet the paradise of the girl who knows how to keep house, and she isn't marooned on a desert of prairie, as she used to be, either, for the myraid little boomtown towns need her and give her a fairly good time, with drives and dances and such like, between the domestic problems which sometimes are so weird and startling as to drive one nearly dotty. The Western woman rises to meet them with a nonchalant and easy nature, which is as admirable as it is surprising to her less adaptable sister from the East. She might have lived in a flat all her life, judging by the way she can contrive and supplement her resources, and she certainly should be canonized among the saints who have "let patience have her perfect work." As she tersely puts it, "Why make a fuss over contraptions when nobody has time to attend to you?" What is the use of the whole matter. There never was a complainer or a fuss without an audience; no one bemoans things in solitude. The women of the West get busy instead, and bravely right what goes wrong.

Good Housekeeping
(By Jane Eddington.)

CREAMED POTATOES
Some one has recently complained in rhyme that travelers of "guests" talk about two things: How comfortable or uncomfortable they were at a given place and "what dangers" they had.

Listen anywhere a number of travelers are having an experience meeting, and see if half their conversation is not about hotels and food! One of my earliest acquaintances on the steamer was a young man who could give entertaining touches to almost anything he attempted to do.

He had served his apprenticeship in description on The Harvard Monthly. In telling me of one of his adventures and hungry return in a street car, he said that he had made up his mind "to blow himself" to a six course dinner and had thought out all he would have to eat—"just figured out to the demi-tasse"—when he saw a sign in a dairy lunch place advertising "extra fine hot waffles."

"I nearly broke the window getting out of that car and into the presence of those waffles," he said, in concluding his account of this adventure.

It is the simple things to eat and the simple diversions that always are the most alluring, and the diversions are often associated with food. The favorite conundrums are often suggested by what is eaten, and even the chance games by which ocean travelers amuse themselves may have the same connection. One of the whist games, has been the curious one of an impromptu guessing—"of how many leaves a pineapple has." It has been said that most people imagine, and for this reason it takes rather a clever person to win.

However, as to simple foods. One of the epicures traveling with us, a real F. F. V. of the Old Dominion, evidently much given to eating and especially to the drinking that goes with a high life (it would have to be high in his case, since he is several inches over six feet tall), describes with greatest gusto some of the dishes, simple ones, he can make and the work of the good cooks he has trained in his day.

He has promised to write me out quite a cook book of his recipes, but since he is, I understand, a director of one of the best known manufacturing companies in the United States and seems to have other interests, I am fearful that I may wait long to get it. At any rate, here are two of the dishes he recommends:

Everything is strict that comes to my mind. One new acquaintance, on finding out my interest, bears it in mind, and whatever new acquaintance he or she makes who lets fall any remarks about eating, my new friend remembers me and does a lot of quizzing for my sake, or introduces me that I may do my own questioning.

If I had time on this moving city and it was as easy to work here as at home, I might learn how they cook and farm and live in Montenegro, Turkey, Russia, etc.

I cannot quite feel that it is courteous to pursue people, so it is mostly the accidental talks that furnish me with some of the inexpressible material on this subject of foods and eating the world over.

Housewives who are in touch with affairs know by experience that change in domestic servants may be easily accomplished, and at small expense, by making use of the Want Columns.

But all these people must forget the conveniences and luxuries and amusements of more finished towns, and make up their minds to take things as they are and make the best of them.

As for domestic, they are at a premium, and probably less likely to have the four qualities above mentioned in good working order than anyone. If by some favor of the gods, a housekeeper secure a jewel of a cook or general, she holds her with a wary grasp, and probably in spite of every precaution, she loses her. The man who paints the verandah, or the grocer to whom she gives her patronage, or the station agent who saw her come in, or even the mayor or the bank manager, or anyone at all may get a beating long enough to cook her into matrimony, even if she be plain enough to scare a train off the track.

The West is yet the paradise of the girl who knows how to keep house, and she isn't marooned on a desert of prairie, as she used to be, either, for the myraid little boomtown towns need her and give her a fairly good time, with drives and dances and such like, between the domestic problems which sometimes are so weird and startling as to drive one nearly dotty. The Western woman rises to meet them with a nonchalant and easy nature, which is as admirable as it is surprising to her less adaptable sister from the East. She might have lived in a flat all her life, judging by the way she can contrive and supplement her resources, and she certainly should be canonized among the saints who have "let patience have her perfect work." As she tersely puts it, "Why make a fuss over contraptions when nobody has time to attend to you?" What is the use of the whole matter. There never was a complainer or a fuss without an audience; no one bemoans things in solitude. The women of the West get busy instead, and bravely right what goes wrong.

Good Housekeeping
(By Jane Eddington.)

CREAMED POTATOES
Some one has recently complained in rhyme that travelers of "guests" talk about two things: How comfortable or uncomfortable they were at a given place and "what dangers" they had.

Listen anywhere a number of travelers are having an experience meeting, and see if half their conversation is not about hotels and food! One of my earliest acquaintances on the steamer was a young man who could give entertaining touches to almost anything he attempted to do.

He had served his apprenticeship in description on The Harvard Monthly. In telling me of one of his adventures and hungry return in a street car, he said that he had made up his mind "to blow himself" to a six course dinner and had thought out all he would have to eat—"just figured out to the demi-tasse"—when he saw a sign in a dairy lunch place advertising "extra fine hot waffles."

"I nearly broke the window getting out of that car and into the presence of those waffles," he said, in concluding his account of this adventure.

It is the simple things to eat and the simple diversions that always are the most alluring, and the diversions are often associated with food. The favorite conundrums are often suggested by what is eaten, and even the chance games by which ocean travelers amuse themselves may have the same connection. One of the whist games, has been the curious one of an impromptu guessing—"of how many leaves a pineapple has." It has been said that most people imagine, and for this reason it takes rather a clever person to win.

However, as to simple foods. One of the epicures traveling with us, a real F. F. V. of the Old Dominion, evidently much given to eating and especially to the drinking that goes with a high life (it would have to be high in his case, since he is several inches over six feet tall), describes with greatest gusto some of the dishes, simple ones, he can make and the work of the good cooks he has trained in his day.

He has promised to write me out quite a cook book of his recipes, but since he is, I understand, a director of one of the best known manufacturing companies in the United States and seems to have other interests, I am fearful that I may wait long to get it. At any rate, here are two of the dishes he recommends:

Everything is strict that comes to my mind. One new acquaintance, on finding out my interest, bears it in mind, and whatever new acquaintance he or she makes who lets fall any remarks about eating, my new friend remembers me and does a lot of quizzing for my sake, or introduces me that I may do my own questioning.

If I had time on this moving city and it was as easy to work here as at home, I might learn how they cook and farm and live in Montenegro, Turkey, Russia, etc.

I cannot quite feel that it is courteous to pursue people, so it is mostly the accidental talks that furnish me with some of the inexpressible material on this subject of foods and eating the world over.

Housewives who are in touch with affairs know by experience that change in domestic servants may be easily accomplished, and at small expense, by making use of the Want Columns.

But all these people must forget the conveniences and luxuries and amusements of more finished towns, and make up their minds to take things as they are and make the best of them.

As for domestic, they are at a premium, and probably less likely to have the four qualities above mentioned in good working order than anyone. If by some favor of the gods, a housekeeper secure a jewel of a cook or general, she holds her with a wary grasp, and probably in spite of every precaution, she loses her. The man who paints the verandah, or the grocer to whom she gives her patronage, or the station agent who saw her come in, or even the mayor or the bank manager, or anyone at all may get a beating long enough to cook her into matrimony, even if she be plain enough to scare a train off the track.

The West is yet the paradise of the girl who knows how to keep house, and she isn't marooned on a desert of prairie, as she used to be, either, for the myraid little boomtown towns need her and give her a fairly good time, with drives and dances and such like, between the domestic problems which sometimes are so weird and startling as to drive one nearly dotty. The Western woman rises to meet them with a nonchalant and easy nature, which is as admirable as it is surprising to her less adaptable sister from the East. She might have lived in a flat all her life, judging by the way she can contrive and supplement her resources, and she certainly should be canonized among the saints who have "let patience have her perfect work." As she tersely puts it, "Why make a fuss over contraptions when nobody has time to attend to you?" What is the use of the whole matter. There never was a complainer or a fuss without an audience; no one bemoans things in solitude. The women of the West get busy instead, and bravely right what goes wrong.

Good Housekeeping
(By Jane Eddington.)

CREAMED POTATOES
Some one has recently complained in rhyme that travelers of "guests" talk about two things: How comfortable or uncomfortable they were at a given place and "what dangers" they had.

Listen anywhere a number of travelers are having an experience meeting, and see if half their conversation is not about hotels and food! One of my earliest acquaintances on the steamer was a young man who could give entertaining touches to almost anything he attempted to do.

He had served his apprenticeship in description on The Harvard Monthly. In telling me of one of his adventures and hungry return in a street car, he said that he had made up his mind "to blow himself" to a six course dinner and had thought out all he would have to eat—"just figured out to the demi-tasse"—when he saw a sign in a dairy lunch place advertising "extra fine hot waffles."

"I nearly broke the window getting out of that car and into the presence of those waffles," he said, in concluding his account of this adventure.

It is the simple things to eat and the simple diversions that always are the most alluring, and the diversions are often associated with food. The favorite conundrums are often suggested by what is eaten, and even the chance games by which ocean travelers amuse themselves may have the same connection. One of the whist games, has been the curious one of an impromptu guessing—"of how many leaves a pineapple has." It has been said that most people imagine, and for this reason it takes rather a clever person to win.

However, as to simple foods. One of the epicures traveling with us, a real F. F. V. of the Old Dominion, evidently much given to eating and especially to the drinking that goes with a high life (it would have to be high in his case, since he is several inches over six feet tall), describes with greatest gusto some of the dishes, simple ones, he can make and the work of the good cooks he has trained in his day.

He has promised to write me out quite a cook book of his recipes, but since he is, I understand, a director of one of the best known manufacturing companies in the United States and seems to have other interests, I am fearful that I may wait long to get it. At any rate, here are two of the dishes he recommends:

Everything is strict that comes to my mind. One new acquaintance, on finding out my interest, bears it in mind, and whatever new acquaintance he or she makes who lets fall any remarks about eating, my new friend remembers me and does a lot of quizzing for my sake, or introduces me that I may do my own questioning.

If I had time on this moving city and it was as easy to work here as at home, I might learn how they cook and farm and live in Montenegro, Turkey, Russia, etc.

I cannot quite feel that it is courteous to pursue people, so it is mostly the accidental talks that furnish me with some of the inexpressible material on this subject of foods and eating the world over.

Housewives who are in touch with affairs know by experience that change in domestic servants may be easily accomplished, and at small expense, by making use of the Want Columns.

But all these people must forget the conveniences and luxuries and amusements of more finished towns, and make up their minds to take things as they are and make the best of them.

As for domestic, they are at a premium, and probably less likely to have the four qualities above mentioned in good working order than anyone. If by some favor of the gods, a housekeeper secure a jewel of a cook or general, she holds her with a wary grasp, and probably in spite of every precaution, she loses her. The man who paints the verandah, or the grocer to whom she gives her patronage, or the station agent who saw her come in, or even the mayor or the bank manager, or anyone at all may get a beating long enough to cook her into matrimony, even if she be plain enough to scare a train off the track.

The West is yet the paradise of the girl who knows how to keep house, and she isn't marooned on a desert of prairie, as she used to be, either, for the myraid little boomtown towns need her and give her a fairly good time, with drives and dances and such like, between the domestic problems which sometimes are so weird and startling as to drive one nearly dotty. The Western woman rises to meet them with a nonchalant and easy nature, which is as admirable as it is surprising to her less adaptable sister from the East. She might have lived in a flat all her life, judging by the way she can contrive and supplement her resources, and she certainly should be canonized among the saints who have "let patience have her perfect work." As she tersely puts it, "Why make a fuss over contraptions when nobody has time to attend to you?" What is the use of the whole matter. There never was a complainer or a fuss without an audience; no one bemoans things in solitude. The women of the West get busy instead, and bravely right what goes wrong.

Good Housekeeping
(By Jane Eddington.)

CREAMED POTATOES
Some one has recently complained in rhyme that travelers of "guests" talk about two things: How comfortable or uncomfortable they were at a given place and "what dangers" they had.

Listen anywhere a number of travelers are having an experience meeting, and see if half their conversation is not about hotels and food! One of my earliest acquaintances on the steamer was a young man who could give entertaining touches to almost anything he attempted to do.

He had served his apprenticeship in description on The Harvard Monthly. In telling me of one of his adventures and hungry return in a street car, he said that he had made up his mind "to blow himself" to a six course dinner and had thought out all he would have to eat—"just figured out to the demi-tasse"—when he saw a sign in a dairy lunch place advertising "extra fine hot waffles."

"I nearly broke the window getting out of that car and into the presence of those waffles," he said, in concluding his account of this adventure.

It is the simple things to eat and the simple diversions that always are the most alluring, and the diversions are often associated with food. The favorite conundrums are often suggested by what is eaten, and even the chance games by which ocean travelers amuse themselves may have the same connection. One of the whist games, has been the curious one of an impromptu guessing—"of how many leaves a pineapple has." It has been said that most people imagine, and for this reason it takes rather a clever person to win.

However, as to simple foods. One of the epicures traveling with us, a real F. F. V. of the Old Dominion, evidently much given to eating and especially to the drinking that goes with a high life (it would have to be high in his case, since he is several inches over six feet tall), describes with greatest gusto some of the dishes, simple ones, he can make and the work of the good cooks he has trained in his day.

He has promised to write me out quite a cook book of his recipes, but since he is, I understand, a director of one of the best known manufacturing companies in the United States and seems to have other interests, I am fearful that I may wait long to get it. At any rate, here are two of the dishes he recommends:

Everything is strict that comes to my mind. One new acquaintance, on finding out my interest, bears it in mind, and whatever new acquaintance he or she makes who lets fall any remarks about eating, my new friend remembers me and does a lot of quizzing for my sake, or introduces me that I may do my own questioning.

If I had time on this moving city and it was as easy to work here as at home, I might learn how they cook and farm and live in Montenegro, Turkey, Russia, etc.

I cannot quite feel that it is courteous to pursue people, so it is mostly the accidental talks that furnish me with some of the inexpressible material on this subject of foods and eating the world over.

Housewives who are in touch with affairs know by experience that change in domestic servants may be easily accomplished, and at small expense, by making use of the Want Columns.

But all these people must forget the conveniences and luxuries and amusements of more finished towns, and make up their minds to take things as they are and make the best of them.

As for domestic, they are at a premium, and probably