Leys returns to Toronto is ample enough vindication of his manly stand in the matter of the Thames fisheries.

When was there ever such an election in London? The "hot-bed of Canadian politics," indeed! Hencefort! must we hang our municipal head in shame; for we have voluntary sacri ficed our sacred privilege of turning things inside out and painting the landscape crimson on election Alas, these be degenerate times! The stranger in London yesterday would never have divined that an electio was in progress. Down town there was no unusual stir, and the little groups about the polling places were the only indications that voting was in progress. Not a single meeting had been held by Col. Leys' supporters since the nomination a week previous; not an oratorical gun had been fired in his behalf; so confident were his friends that the great mass of the electors, irrespective of political leaning, would seize the opportunity to show their approval of the independent action of the member for London. It was a curious election-for London. Even the small boy and his tin horn were absent, and the police had a quiet day and night. As if to be in keeping with the low degree registered by the political thermometer, there came along a welcome cool wave that drove people back to top-coats and heavy underwear. Great crowds gathered in front of The Advertiser office when the returns began to come in, but apart from the smiles with which each new victory of the colonel was greeted, there was no demonstration; and by 6:30 o'clock the street was empty save for the ordinary

RECEIVING THE RETURNS.

The Advertiser's system of receiing and bulletining the returns wa admirable and enabled people dov town to learn the result before star ing home for supper. The polls close at 5 o'clock, and a half hour later a the returns had been posted. It doubtful whether the result of an ele tion in London was ever before made known so speedily. Of course, th light vote polled made the count most of the subdivisions an easy tas As soon as each deputy-returning o ficer had completed his recounting, special Advertiser messenger rushe the result to the office, where it w bulletined a few minutes later. COL. LEYS SPEAKS.

After the majority of the su divisions had been heard from, Co Leys briefly addressed the expecta crowds from a window of The Adver tiser editorial rooms. He said:

Fellow Electors,-I thank you f the confidence you have reposed in me again. I regret exceedingly that I was obliged to resign my seat. did it to get justice to the people my constituency, and I would do so again if it were necessary. Purdom, K.C., spoke brief-

This was the end, he said, of an lection that had undoubtedly resulted in a way that was satisfactory to all parties. It had been characterized by good feeling between Conservatives and Liberals. It was the first that had been free of party feeling, and he hoped it marked the end of bitter elections 'n London. The Conservatives had acted in a manly way indeed, and it was the duty of Liberals to thank them. They had held out peace towards the Reform candidate and the Reform Government, and in this election there were no party is-Col. Leys was again the member for London, and he hoped that he would remain so for a long time to come. (Hear, hear.) We could be sure, Mr. Purdom concluded that the city's interests were in good hands. (Cheers). THE VOTE.

Yesterday's vote was probably the course, at once apparent. It was not due to lack of interest in the issue, but rather to the widespread feeling Yesterday it was not a struggle be- ) ed away from the polls, not through question of party policy; indeed, it tion a foregone conclusion. Thus the

STRATHCONA'S ENGLISH HOME

Formerly the Country Seat of the Late Novelist, Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton.

A Most Interesting and Historical Residence-Many Masterpieces of the Great Painters—An Extensive Library.

Recently the Hon. David Mills, Minister of Justice, and Mrs. Mills, were entertained by Lord Strathcona at Knebworth, the English country seat of the late novelist, Sir Edward Bulwer Lytton, Here Lord and Lady Strathcona, and their married daughter, and her husband and children, reside a good deal of the time. Lord Strathcona and Hon. David Mills are old parliamentary and personal friends. To the editor of The Advertiser Mr. Mills writes of the old historic place, as follows:

"Three years have gone by since he obtained the lease from the present lands, are those of Stephen C. Foster, Lord Lytton; and as Bulwer Lytton's who died almost 40 years ago, writes novels were of a particular type, I felt a good deal of interest in seeing his Foster left more than 150 songs, of ountry seat, for I was very confident which the melodies as well as that his own mental characteristics words were his own. That not all of would be impressed upon all his surthemare remembered should not surprise roundings, and in this respect I was not disappointed. The house was erected very early in the sixteenth century, all the really "popular" songs of some and further additions were made to it stream composers. Shortly after. There is a stone fence But to count or open work, having the appearance of being made of open work and scantling, extending around the house and fair to live forever, one must use all forming a curtilage. On many of the large stone pillars are placed griffins, some extra digits from his friends. covered with scales, and having the most extraordinary appearance, some of them with horns on, and others with birdlike beaks, so that they are calculated to leave upon your mind the impression that you have got back to the days of the Dryads and Hamadry-

There world. are a good many stone fountains, which are not in active operation, and which are of very handsome designs. There been translated into all the languages ing upon the grounds on high pedestals, but as the climate is damp, many of them have moss growing upon them. The lines are poetic only in the sense of suggestion; they are so simple and artless that it But the whole effect is to leave upon your mind the impression that you are really transferred into the kind of world in which the minds of the old cultured Greek characters dwelt. There is a section of the grounds in the forest called by the late proprietor. Edward Bulwer Lytton, 'Horace's Garden, in which there is a pool known as 'the lake,' perhaps three or four 5 rods in width and ten or fifteen in length. In this I noticed a gigantic swan swimming. I was told he had been there for very many years-fifty, at least. I observed a pretty summerhouse on this lakelet, where I was told Lord Lytton used sometimes in the summer season to spend a portion of his time. There is a great deal about the grounds that is very characteristic, and there are still more marks of the individuality of the novelist in the house. In the gallery there is a fine collection of paintings. I no-0 ticed over 60 pictures in this gallery. some of them Italian, but most of them 591 the product of Sir Peter Lely and other English painters. There were in this collection a good many of the sove-reigns, from the time of Henry VI. downward. I noticed among them Edward VI., William III., Mary, James I., Charles I., Charles II. There were fine portraits of Lucy Waters, Nell Gwynne, Admiral Blake and many others.

"In the second story there is a large reception room containing many beautiful pictures and candelabra of Hindoo art supported by two Hindoo figures. In this room there are some magnificent paintings, and cabinets, or pieces of furniture, made from tortoiseshell and inlaid with pearls. There are also in this room pictures of Elizabeth and other distinguished personages of the Tudor period. Over another room are hung a good many banners-among those a banner of Henry the Fifth at Agincourt and of Henry the Seventh at Bosworth Field, the banner carried was presented to the son of Sir Bulwer Lytton (Owen Meredith) when he had proclaimed the Queen Empress of India during the period that he was Viceroy.

"In several of the rooms the walls are covered with very beautiful tapes-try of the time of Elizabeth, and we occupied a room known as the room of Elizabeth, in which it is said that she stayed over night during the period that the Spanish Armada threatened landing at Tewksbury. The mantelpiece reaches entirely to the ceiling. It consists of oak most elaborately carved, and is nearly as black as ink with age. The bedstead is also of oak similarly carved, with a carved canopy, supported by figures carved from the oak. There are a great number of beautiful paintings in almost every room of the house, and I noticed in the dressing-room adjoining the one which I have just described at least forty very fine oil paintings o various persons, and one, set in the ceiling, of some one of the female members of the Lytton family. Everything bears traces of Sir Edward Lytton's taste, and the amount expended upon the pic-tures must have been very large in-The hall from which the leads to the next story is covered with ancient shields, spears and matchlock guns and old pistols. There are at least a dozen swords hanging upon the wall, and I noticed three suits of armor besides those in this part of the house. 'The library room is upwards of 30 feet by perhaps 26 or more, and all the shelves are full. Besides the books in the library, I noticed three tiers of shelves in the picture gallery, below the pictures, every one of which was filled with books. I do not know how many volumes there are, but I would say that there are six or eight thou-sand altogether. I noticed that he had

The story of Guy Darrell was perhaps the story of his life and in some respects it seems to have been purposeless. He has written a good many books of interest. The two which impressed me as among the best are 'What Will He Do With It?' and 'The Last of the Barons.' You see indications of refined tasts, somewhat indications of refined taste, somewhat oriental in its magnificence, the expenditure of large sums of money in its gratification, and you muse over the disappearance of the man who was for a time its proprietor. "This estate is beautifully situated. The country around is in a very high state of cultivation, and the landscape very fine. Lord Strathcona told me that when he came into possession the herd of deer upon the estate numbered upwards of seventy. Now I think there are about twice this number. I give you this sketch of the residence of one who was one of the great imaginative writers of our own times, and as colonial secretary was regarded as a successful administrator and a statesman of more than average ability. This estate is in the county of Hereford, and about thirty miles from London, a few miles beyond Hatfield House, and is reached by the same line of railway.'

There is an oft-told story of a regiment of troops, with pay overdue four months, that was overtaken by the paymaster just as it reached a camp near a great city, in which everything was "wide open." Many of the men, with their pockets full of money,"broke guard," and returned to camp in a condition prejudicial to good order and military discipline. The guard themselves became untrustworthy, good men though they had been on the march and in battle; the sober men of the regiment strove unsuccessfully to restrain the uncontrollable, the colonel gravitated between slaughter and suicide, when suddenly the leader of the band asked permission to try his hand on the disturbing element. Grouping his musicians in the center of the camp, he started "The Old Folks at Home," and played unceasing for half an hour, when the officer of the guard reported that the camp was entirely quiet, even the most uproarious drunkards having wept themselves to sleep. Several songs that have long sur vived the author, as well as the "peculiar institution" that suggested them, were reflections of slave life. Among them is "Old Black Joe," Of this it may be said in passing that when Wilhelmj, the virtuoso violinist, first
