

Land & Home: Such is the title of an American journal "for land owners and home lovers, everywhere." The numbers published, so far, give promise of a most useful career. For the last twenty three years we have read with care several of the best American agricultural journals. Amongst much that is good, experience has taught us that there has been a great deal too much undigested matter, written either to take the eye, or, worse, for axegyring. Such articles, always hurtful to many farmers, still find room in most journals and are unfortunately, put in without editorial comment: in fact, the aim seems to be, to too great an extent, quantity of reading matter, and not quality. In the long run the publication of all such matter does a great deal of harm, and discourages the ordinary farmer from the reading of agricultural journals or books, no matter how useful. It gives some reason for the cry, still so common, against book farming generally.

"The Land and Home" is a beautifully printed and extensively illustrated weekly; it replaces the Scientific Farmer a monthly, which in its five years of existence had secured for itself a very high reputation. This new journal is edited with great care by men who appear to be remarkably well informed on all matters relating to agricultural pursuits. So far, particular pains have been taken to give room in their paper to the most reliable articles only. The names on the Editorial staff are known in America amongst the most able farmers; men whose whose aim has been to reason out every farm operation and to bring brain work as a guide to manual labor. With such men and such a programme added to the business enterprise shown so far, this journal should become, very soon, the leading agricultural publication in America. We wish it every success, and should be happy to have it extensively circulated in Canada. Any of our readers sending us fifty cents will receive "The Land and Home" for three months, post paid.
