without a yed satispecuniary ng thirtyese were ship to a parrenness ely profit-There can l readiness rould have been rank ne country ury. The raised for to accept w-citizens. his friends non cause. l parts of e baseless e side of ttendance n London, presents a long list of famous names, and among them that of Lord Russell, who had come expressly to recall any unjust things which, misled by the offers of compromise with slavery made in Congress on the approach of the war, he might have said of Lincoln and the American Government. Mill pronounced the eulogy of philosophy on the reformer who had been derided as an incendiary and a fanatic. But the principal part on the occasion was justly assigned to Bright, who throughout the conflict had upheld with his noblest eloquence the cause of the North, though to his memory, when he died, the Senate of the United States refused to pay a tribute, because, having been the firm friend of their Union, he had been loyal also to his own. George Thompson was there with his son-in-law, F. W. Chesson, a man who by the steadfast, unselfish and modest devotion of a life to the championship of weak and oppressed races, earned though he did not wear a crown. His name, by most readers hardly noticed among those of the illustrious company at the Garrison breakfast, shines conspicuous in the eyes of all who had watched his life-long labours and knew his worth.

It was one of the proofs of Garrison's freedom from personal ambition and the irritability which it is apt to engender, that he carried through all his controversies and through the life-long storm of obloquy and abuse a temper in private perfectly unsoured, warm affections, and the fullest capacity for domestic enjoy-

(185)

.